Acknowledgments

We gratefully acknowledge the generous support provided by the Center for Regional Studies, which was instrumental in the development of the Navajo Corpus of Historical Narratives. Their funding, totaling US$23,000 distributed across four semesters, enabled us to curate, annotate, and digitize this valuable resource.

We are also grateful to Dr. William Croft, who first proposed developing a Navajo corpus and connected it to the NSF-funded project “Collaborative Research: Developing a Uniform Meaning Representation for Natural Language Processing” (NSF Grant #1764091). The corpus served as a testing ground for the project’s semantic annotation tools, while the project in turn provided essential support that helped bring the corpus to fruition. This mutual relationship has contributed to enhancing resources for Navajo language studies.

Manuel Fernandez provided essential assistance in the early stages of digitizing the corpus in FLE_x, for which we thank him.

We also thank Dr. Joshua Birchall for recommending that the present volume—the nine narratives drawn from the corpus—be published as part of the Open Text Collections series at Language Science Press.

Finally, we would like to thank the editors Carolyn O’Meara and Christian Döhler, our proofreader Matthew Korte, as well as the two anonymous reviewers for their invaluable and encouraging support throughout the publication process.

1.1 Introduction

This collection is the published manuscript of the Navajo Corpus of Historical Narratives (NCHN) (Denk & Chee 2025). The NCHN is a digital compilation of 9 annotated narratives chosen from the Navajo Historical Selections published by Robert W. Young and William Morgan in the 1950s. The Navajo Historical Selections, in turn, are texts selected from the monthly newspaper Ádahoónílgíí written in the Navajo language (Diné Bizaad) and published in the Southwestern United States from 1943 to 1957 (McCarty & Bias 2002: 51) and translated by Young and Morgan.

Compared to the wealth of texts available for Navajo relative to other Native American languages, this collection represents only a small fraction. While the Navajo Corpus for Historical Narratives (NCHN) was primarily developed to create a repository of morphologically annotated words and to establish a consistent glossing strategy for Navajo, to enhance both educational resources and linguistic conventions (see Denk 2024), it also offers critical insights into the complex history encompassing the struggle for land reclamation and the integration of traditional narratives. This selection reflects the diversity of Navajo thought of the late 19th and first half of the 20th century and invites both linguistic and cultural investigation, expanding the pool of materials for a Diné philology.

The corpus text presented here contains three versions of the story “The trouble at Round Rock”, published in Young & Morgan (1952); the latest edition is from 2015. These narratives depict a pivotal event in Diné history: the fight between the chief, Black Horse, and Navajo Agent Shipley in October 1892, after Navajos had moved back to their homeland from their forced exile in Fort Sumner. This fight was a reaction to new government policies imposed whereby children ought to be relocated from their families and placed in English boarding schools. This story is told from three different Navajo perspectives, one of the narrators witnessing the event directly. The remaining 6 annotated texts originate from the 25 narratives published in the Historical Collections by the same authors two years later (Young & Morgan 1954) and provide diverse personal, political, historical, and traditional accounts of Navajo life. With over 10,000 words, the NCHN is the largest morphologically annotated collection of Navajo texts, and we are pleased to present it as part of the Open Text Collection series.

1.2 The setting

Navajo speakers refer to themselves as “Diné” which means “The People.” The traditional homeland of the Diné, known as Diné Bikéyah, encompasses the region between the Four Sacred Mountains in the Southwestern United States: Sisnaajini or Blanca Peak in the east, Tsoodzil or Mt. Taylor in the south; Dok’o’oosliid or the San Francisco Peaks in the west; and Dibéntsaa or Hesperus Peak in the north. These form the spiritual and historical foundation of the Navajo world (Iverson & Roessel 2002; Blake 2001; Linford 2000; Griffin-Pierce 1997). According to Navajo oral history, these mountains not only delineate the boundaries of their homeland but are key symbols of their cosmology and cultural identity (Blake 2001).

The Navajo Nation is the largest Native American reservation in the US, covering parts of Arizona, New Mexico, and Utah. It is characterized by its vast arid landscape, stretching across approximately 27,000 square miles. Major towns like Window Rock (Tségháhoodzání; the capital), Kayenta (Tó Dínéeshzhee), and Shiprock (Tsé Bit’a’i) serve as cultural and economic centers, while smaller towns with chapter houses are scattered throughout the region, including traditional settlements like family-owned sheep camps and hooghan dwellings.

The relationship between the Diné and their land is strong and predates colonization, but subsequent, modern events have also contributed to the awareness of what it means to be Navajo. In 1863, the Navajo Long Walk – a forced relocation imposed on the Navajo people – left a lasting impact on the bond of future generations with their homeland. This devastating event, marked by military defeat and captivity, has since become a central element of modern Navajo identity (Csordas 2000). This experience disrupted their way of life and following the return to their homeland and the establishment of the Navajo reservation by the treaty of 1868, the Long Walk still persists in the collective mind of Diné people and informs the interpretation of the historical events that happened thereafter (Csordas 2000). However, the long walk was not the only event that would bring hardship to the people. After the reservation was established, Navajos were still forced to assimilate into white society. With the opening of Bureau of Indian Affairs across the reservation, the US government displaced children from their family environment by sending them to boarding schools, where they would be taught in an English-only environment and children who would speak their own language would be punished. Understandably, Navajo families were suspicious of or outright against this implementation, setting the conditions for fights between agents and Navajo leaders. One of these fights, the trouble at Round Rock, is presented here in three narratives.

In the following decades, the US government continued its attempts of forced assimilation, for example through the Livestock Reduction act during the Great Depression. The act consisted of reducing animals with the pretense that large herds would compromise agricultural yields and lead to further erosion of areas affected by the Dust Bowl. Navajos overwhelmingly opposed the act as undermining their very existence and way of life but weren't able to revoke it. This tragedy is recorded in the historical selection by featuring two Navajo voices (Our Abuse; The Special Grazing Regulation).

Despite this and following exploitative practices like Uranium mining and fracking, the historical, geographic and traditional knowledge remains unbroken. And part of this knowledge can be seen in additional narratives that depict traditional stories which have remained in the common consciousness since time immemorial. The relationship between Navajos and their homeland is therefore not only characterized by the negative effects endured during colonization, but by the enduring traditional knowledge, inside and outside the reservation, and new avenues of creativity. Part of this strong connection is probably due to their close family relationships that are frequently brought to consciousness when introducing one another, namely the clan system.

In Navajo society, every individual belongs to four clans, two inherited from the mother and two from the father, following a matrilineal system. The clans are associated with geographical areas and some of them are featured in the creation stories. Clan affiliation also influences marriage patterns, as it is forbidden to marry within one's own maternal or paternal clan. In this way, Navajos maintain a system of exogamy that fosters social unity across different kinship groups. Some traditional stories and rituals are also considered the property of specific clans, passed down through generations as part of the oral tradition. Women play a central role as guardians of these traditions (McCloskey 2007; Denetdale 2015).

According to the 2019 census as reported by Ethnologue (Eberhard et al. 2021), there are approximately 300,000 ethnic Navajos, of whom 170,000 are speakers. Denetclaw (2017) further reported 7,600 monolinguals. Despite having the largest number of speakers among indigenous languages in the U.S., it is classified as "threatened" (6b in the Ethnologue EGIDS scale), indicating that speaker numbers have declined since this census and continue to decrease. Navajo is taught in schools on the reservation, and various language revitalization programs have been developed to address concerns about language attrition. Bilingualism is a defining feature in Diné society due to Navajo being spoken in school and integrated in school curricula alongside English. Despite this, Navajo exhibits a relatively small number of loans (According to Wiktionary, 58 English and 38 Spanish loans)¹. While their language was unrelated to the ones of Pueblo tribes in the area (Keresan, Tanoan, Zuñi, Hopi), Navajo communities were culturally connected to them through trade and intermarriage before European colonization (Warburton & Begay 2005). Despite the high levels of English fluency today, many Diné, even in urban environments, remain deeply committed to maintaining their culture and connection to the ancestral land between the Four Sacred Mountains.

1.3 Grammar sketch

1.3.1 Introduction

Navajo is a Southern Athabaskan (or Apachean) language, part of the larger Athabaskan language family, which extends across Canada, Alaska, and the southwestern United States. Athabaskan was chosen by Albert Gallatin in 1863 referring to the Lake Athabasca where these languages are spoken (Gallatin 1836: 17). The name itself originates from the Moose Cree word Āđapāskāw “[where] there are plants one after the other”, describing the lake (Bright 2004: 52). The alternative denomination for the family is Dene, reflecting the common word for ‘people’ across these language, which is also present in Diné Bizaad, the endonym for Navajo. Navajo is spoken primarily within the Navajo Nation, but generally in the territory spanning parts of Arizona, New Mexico, and Utah, and Colorado.

Like Athabaskan languages, Navajo is a coronal-heavy language with multiple contrasts in stops and affricates. Syntactically, Navajo is known for a tendency for subject-object-verb order (or: Agent, Patient, Verb), although the order of constituents is rather determined by animacy and topicality (Willie 2000). Navajo is a head-final and head-marking language in which participants precede the verbs that index them, possessor nouns precede possessed nouns that index them, noun phrases precede postpositions that index them. Subordinate clauses tend to precede main clauses, linked by enclitics attached to them.

Morphologically, Navajo is heavily prefixing, and features enclitics. While noun words have little morphology, verbs feature a great array of prefixes. The verbal structure is commonly divided into multiple morpheme positions which are grouped into three domains: disjunct (outer prefixes; positions 0-III), conjunct (inner prefixes; positions IV-IX) and stem (or root, position X). The difference between conjunct and disjunct prefixes is mainly phonological (Sapir & Hoijer 1967; Kari 1973, 1975; and Young & Morgan 1987, McDonough 1995). Each domain hosts lexical (or thematic), inflectional and derivational information sketched in Table 1.1.

Table 1.1: Domains of the Navajo verb and their morphological categories

Lexical information, (Lexical) Aspect	Lexical information, (Lexical) Aspect	Lexical information, (Lexical) Aspect

	Agreement

Navajo features multiple conjugations, in which morphemes from all these domains interact. The distributed nature of these morpheme categories and the fused and syncretic forms of paradigms makes Navajo and other Athapaskan languages quite difficult to segment and analyze.

In the following sections, we will provide a larger overview of its phonology, morphology, and syntax, and emphasize its most typologically striking features. To understand the glossing convention that we adopted for the NCHN and for this publication, we will provide a sketch of different morphological analyses that will allow us to justify the choice in the segmentation of verbs.

1.3.2 Phonology

The following phonological review will concentrate on the phonemic inventory of consonants and vowels.

1.3.2.1 Consonants

Navajo has a primarily obstruent, coronal-heavy inventory. This inventory is shared by all Athabaskan languages. These obstruents contain stops, fricatives, affricates, with their laryngeal realizations as plain, ejective, and aspirated. In addition, Navajo has a lateral series involving lateral fricatives and affricates. Athabaskan languages exhibit a series of aspirated stops. However, in Navajo, the stops /t^h/ and /k^h/ are not realized as aspiration in the laryngeal sense (open glottis after stop release). Rather, these stops are coarticulated with a heavily spirantized velar release (McDonough & Wood 2008; Iskarous et al. 2012) and are therefore interpreted as /tx/ and /kx/ phonemes. This is a feature across Athabaskan languages, as witnessed in Northern Athabaskan languages spoken along the Mackenzie River (Dene Speech Atlas, McDonough 2013). Table 1.2 shows the organization of Navajo consonants using IPA and orthographic symbols.

Table 1.2 combines analyses from Young & Morgan (1987) and McDonough (2003) but uses additional labels to condense the information. Among these are the stops with a complex release: anterior, *posterior*² and lateral, referring to alveolar, postalveolar, and lateral fricative components. This series is extended to the continuants further down, where the manner of articulation of the onset is the same as the manner of the release (fricatives and approximants). The table does not include allophones. A notable allophonic rule is palatalization (Young & Morgan 1987: vx) which applies to coronals and velars. It is worth mentioning that McDonough (2003: 4) lists /ç/ as part of the inventory, but Young & Morgan (1987: vx) treat it as an allophone of /x/. In addition, the distinction between fricatives and approximants is not always clear-cut. This is because the approximant /j/ has a fricative allophone [j] and /ɣ^w/ and /ɣ/ have approximant allophones [w] and [u]. For more information on the allophonic rules, consult Young & Morgan (1987: xii-xv), McDonough (2003); further analyses on allophones are Iskarous et al. (2012), McDonough (1990), Palakurthy (2019), and earlier accounts such as Saville (1968) and Harris (1945).

Most importantly, the full set of phonological contrasts listed in Table 1.2 is attested only in stem onsets. As McDonough (2003: 7) observes, this highly restricted phonemic distribution renders the traditional notion of a phonemic inventory somewhat misleading, since the contrasts are confined to a single positional slot within a multisyllabic word. This restriction is particularly evident in the aspirated and glottalized stop series (McDonough 2003: 43–45). These are characterized by a relatively long release phase. In these segments, the interval between the stop closure and voice onset is substantially longer than in their plain counterparts (/p/, /t/, /ts/, /tʃ/, /tɬ/). On the basis of this durational property, McDonough (2003: 81) classifies these segments as “complex,” distinguishing them from the plain stops and affricates but also from consonant clusters that would rather be constrained by syllable structure (cf. McDonough 2003: 75). Outside of stems, the consonants that occur are “almost exclusively coronal” (McDonough 2003: 43). McDonough & Wood (2008) demonstrate that this simplex-complex contrast among consonants is likely a cross-Athabaskan characteristic.

1.3.2.2 Vowels

There are four different vowel qualities (/a/, /e/, /i/, /o/). The vowels contrast in length, tone (high, low) and nasality, resulting in 16 vowel contrasts. There is a quality difference between the long and short high front [ɪ] vs. [i:] (Young & Morgan 1987: xii). The vowel inventory is presented in Table 1.3.

Table 1.3: Vowels (monophthongs only, IPA and Navajo orthography in brackets)

	ORAL		NASAL
	SHORT	LONG	SHORT	LONG
LOW TONE	ɑ ɛ ɪ ɔ ⟨a, e, i, o⟩	ɑ: ɛ: ɪ: ɔ: ⟨aa, ee, ii, oo⟩	ã ẽ ĩ õ ⟨a, e, i, o⟩	ã: ẽ: ĩ: õ: ⟨aa, ee, ii, oo⟩

Besides the monophthongs, the following diphthongs and vowel clusters exist (according to Young & Morgan 1987: xii): ⟨ai, aii, ai, ei, eii, ao, oi, oii⟩. Long vowels and diphthongs may exhibit high and low tones successively; this tonal combination is referred to as rising and falling tones, such as ⟨éé⟩ or ⟨ooí⟩ (Young & Morgan 1987: xiii). However, these falling and rising tones aren’t contrastive, as they are always conditioned by morpho-phonological processes such as lengthening, contractions, and assimilation caused by enclitics (same page). For further information on the tonal system and its realization, across Athabaskan, we recommend the reader to consult Young & Morgan (1987), Krauss (2005), Kingston (2005), McDonough (2003). The next section discusses the orthographic conventions used for Navajo.

1.3.2.3 Orthographic conventions

The development of Navajo orthography has been a gradual process, influenced by early transcription attempts and evolving into a system that captures Navajo phonetics with increasing precision. Initial recordings by non-Navajo figures like Pedro Bautista Pino, James Hervey Simpson, and J.H. Eaton in the 19th century used English-based transcriptions that approximated, but did not accurately capture, Navajo sounds. A breakthrough came with Washington Matthews in the 1880s, who introduced phonetic symbols like ɪ, the barred or “slash-I” (Williams 2009: 53). This work was further advanced in the early 20th century by Fray Bernard Haile and Franciscan missionaries. In 1916, the American Anthropological Association set phonetic standards that influenced Navajo orthography, particularly nasalized vowel representations like the “hook” or “ogonek” (ḁ, ḙ, ḭ, ḟ), although digraphs (e.g., ch, dl, ts) were not consistently adopted afterwards (Herzog et al. 1934: 624).

A major step in standardizing Navajo orthography came in 1943 when Robert Young and William Morgan, under the Office of Indian Affairs, created an accessible, typewriter-compatible alphabet that aligned with the English QWERTY keyboard. This system, initially introduced in The Navaho Language: The Elements of Navaho Grammar (Young & Morgan 1969), and later refined in their 1980 dictionary (Young & Morgan 1980), became the primary writing system for Navajo. The Young and Morgan orthography has since remained the most widely accepted and used system and became a foundational tool for Navajo literacy and linguistic research. The orthographic symbols of this standard are presented in the respective tables for the consonants (Table 1.2) and vowels (Table 1.3).

1.3.3 Morphology

As mentioned in Section 1.1, Navajo is heavily prefixing like other Athapaskan languages and features enclitics. Suffixes or proclitics are rare. The distribution of morphological operations is skewed toward the verbs, as this part of speech has most of the prefixes of the language. In contrast, nouns and postpositions exhibit minimal inflection, limited to (possessive) person prefixes and marginal plurality markers, some of which can be interpreted as suffixes; e.g., ’ashkii ‘boy’ ’ashii-ké ‘boys’. Enclitics are numerous, and can be classified into subordinating, relativizing, interrogative, postpositional and adjectival enclitics (Young & Morgan 1987: part I:17–23) attaching to phrases and clauses. Furthermore, because nouns, adverbs, and postpositions are frequently derived from verbs through enclitics, they inherit their complex morphological structure.

Due to its verbal morphological complexity, Navajo and other Athapaskan languages are often considered polysynthetic (Mithun 1983, 2015; Fortescue 2007, Sapir 1921), most notably because its verbs “can function as complete predication in themselves” (Mithun 2015: 38). However, this classification is not unanimous. Mattissen (2004) notes that Athapaskan languages, including Navajo, are not prototypically polysynthetic (Navajo fulfills only 2 out of 5 criteria). De Reuse (2009) goes further, rejecting the label for Athapaskan languages on the grounds that they lack “productive noninflectional concatenation” (2009: 21–22). Indeed, some derivational prefixes are highly lexicalized and unproductive, while inflectional categories are interspersed between them, a pattern that has been named “interrupted synthesis” (Kari 1989; Whorf 1956 [1932]).

This structure has crucial implications for morphological theory. On the one hand, one can segment verbs into morphs and assign a single meaning to them. On the other hand, one can treat different morphs in the verb as forming a unitary category, a category that is distributed across different elements in the verb.

Example (1) illustrates the verb nikidadii'níish ‘We all start to work’ using two analytical approaches: linear and distributional.

 [Transitional.Inception] [1.PL] [work.MOM.IMPF]
 ‘We all start to work.’

Linear analyses segment the verb sequentially, assigning each part a distinct function. This can be done on the surface level (1a) or through a more detailed templatic analysis (1b). A surface-level approach would segment the morphs linearly and assign each morph the features that it expresses. This leads to some morphs exhibiting many grammatical categories, such as ii'- ‘1.DU/PL.YI.ZERO.IMPF’.

The templatic approach in (1b) is another linear analysis but further decomposes surface-fusional morphs into underlying components, where ii'- is analyzed as the combination of the prefixes yi-Ø-ii-d- from positions VIc, VII, VIII, and IX, respectively.

A distributional analysis (1c), by contrast, groups often non-adjacent morphs into functional categories, such as “Transitional Inception” or “1.PL”, even when a single morph contributes to multiple categories (e.g., ii'-). Many linguists prefer this type of analysis for Athabaskan languages in general, and analyze different verb theme categories (Slate 1989; Kari 1989; Hardy 1979), where derivational and inflectional features are properties of the whole verb rather than of individual morphemes.

Navajo morphology can thus be viewed as fusional (one morph, many categories, e.g., 1.DU/PL.YI.ZERO.IMPF), agglutinative (one morph, one category, e.g., yi-Ø-ii-d-) or non-concatenative/distributional (several morphs, one category). This multiplicity of perspectives is reflected in the standard reference (Young & Morgan 1987, Young et al. 1992), which uses both templatic positions and (fusional) conjugation charts for each verb. We will outline this template and the dictionary’s presentation of inflected forms. In addition, we will provide insights from the bipartite approach by McDonough (1990). These perspectives are essential for understanding the glossing conventions used in the narratives in Section 1.4.

1.3.3.1 The verbal template

Young & Morgan (1987) and Young et al. (1992) make use of a verbal template that abstracts over fully inflected verb forms by identifying a sequence of morphological positions within the verb. The template serves as an orienting framework that allows readers to locate types of morphemes relative to the order they appear in verbs and to compare Navajo verbal structure with that of other Athabaskan languages. It is not, however, intended as a word-formation mechanism. The template, based on Young & Morgan (1987) and Young et al. (1992)³, is presented in Table 4 and identifies a sequence of morphological positions, including the stem, subject and object agreement, aspectual and modal marking, valence (classifier), and various derivational or thematic elements.

³The template was first formulated in the 1987 volume, but the 1992 template provides extra distinctions within positions which are important to explain the glossing conventions. We will therefore use the template from the 1992 version.

1 Preliminaries

Yet again, one can see that the templatic approach works well for morphs at the left edge of verbs, but conjunct morphs like ees- cannot be assigned to a single templatic position. Instead, ees- is part of a paradigm that Young and Morgan reference with multiple verb entries. The next section explains how these verb entries are structured.

1.3.3.2 Verbal entries in The Navajo language (1987)

In The Navajo language (1987), verbs are alphabetized by their first letter as they appear, with each entry headed by a first-person singular imperfective form, e.g., 'ádísk'qas 'I am stretching myself'. This verbal entry is shown in Figure 1.1.

'ádísk'qas (I), 'ándísk'qas (R), 'ádésk'qáz (P), 'ádideesk'qas (F), 'ádósk'qas (O) (d), to stretch (oneself). Yiizì' dóó 'ádésk'qáz, I stood up and stretched (myself)./ Mó-sí yázhí 'aìhosh nt'ée' ndii'na'go 'ádeesk'qáz, the kitten got up from its sleep and stretched (itself)./ (*d-k'qas = k'qas: to straighten. Lit. to straighten oneself. Cf. yisk'qas, to straighten it.) ('ádi-.)

The structure of the verb entry provides the following key information:

1. Mode forms: First-person singular forms for the Imperfective (I), Iterative (R), Perfective (P), Future (F), and Optative (O).
2. Classifier: The valence marker (Position IX) in parentheses (e.g. "d").
3. Translation: An English infinitive (e.g., 'to stretch (oneself)').
4. Examples: Illustrative sentences in Navajo translated into English.
5. Stem information: The classifier-stem shape (e.g., k'qas, derived from d-k'qas), which determines stem shape across modes.
6. Stem translation: The meaning of the stem-classifier combination (e.g., 'to straighten').
7. Prefix string and conjugation: The pre-stem complex (inflectional, derivational, and thematic prefixes) for each mode, either listed directly or referenced to paradigmatic tables (e.g. 'ádi-', with reference to pg. 23).

8. Derivational links: References to similar derived verbs (e.g., yisk'qqs 'to straighten it').

This organization allows any inflected form to be traced systematically to its stem and conjugation pattern. For example, in the entry for 'ádísk'qqs (see Figure 1.1), the pre-stem element 'ádi- is identified as a reflexive prefix. As mentioned above, the entry also indexes a page containing a conjugation table for all verbs sharing this prefix string (see Figure 1.2).

These tables enable users to construct other person/number forms. To form the second-person singular optative of 'ádísk'qqs, for instance, one would combine the optative prefix string 'ádóó- from the table with the stem k'qqs, yielding 'ádóók'qqs 'you may stretch yourself'. For the Perfective columns, the classifier as well as the conjugation prefixes in Position VII (si-, ni-, yi- or Ø-) are necessary to locate the correct form. The perfective form of 'ádísk'qqs is 'ádésk'qqs, and therefore belongs to the second column of the perfective conjugation, 'ádésh-, 'adíni-, 'adees- etc. (SI-perfective). Phonological processes, such as consonant harmony (changing 'ádésh- to 'ádés- before a stem with /s/), must also be applied.

Some entries, like 'ádádiisdzíid ('I am sipping it'), list their full conjugation paradigm directly if it is not shared by other verbs. The conjugation can be located in an indented part, as shown of the entry of 'ádádiisdzíid in Figure 1.3.

The structure of listing verbs in their full form is particularly valuable for working with naturally occurring texts, as it begins with actual word forms. However, for glossing, which requires breaking words into smaller morphological entities, a templatic approach is also necessary.

'ádádiisdzíid(I), 'ádáníisdzi'(R), 'ádádiisdziid(P), 'ádádideesdził(F), 'ádádoosdziíd(O)(d), to sip it, to take a sip of it, to take a swallow of it, to take a dose of it (liquid medicine). 1.3.3.3 Verbal entries in the Analytical lexicon (1992)

The Analytical lexicon (Young et al. 1992) takes a complementary, stem-based approach. Since Navajo verb stems alternate for both inflectional mode and more lexicalized aspectual categories, this organization provides a different analytical perspective. A root entry⁵, such as ZIID (see Figure 1.4), shows a complete set of stem alternations across the different modes, but also across multiple aspects (e.g., Momentaneous, Conclusive, Continuative).

⁵In Young et al. (1992), the terms “stem” and “root” are not formally distinguished; both refer to the core lexical morpheme of a verb. However, they employ “root” specifically as the dictionary entry that represents the entire set of related inflected and derived stems. This canonical entry is based on the perfective (momentaneous or neuter) stem and is typographically distinguished by capitalization, e.g., ZIID (the root/entry) versus ziid (a specific stem).

Derived verb stems are clustered under one root entry (namely, the stem pertaining to the perfective mode and the momentaneous aspect). Sub-entries specify different aspects, classifiers, and thematic/derivational prefixes, creating distinct verb themes. These themes are cross-referenced to the 1987 dictionary. For example, the verb 'ádádiisdzǝ́ǝd (Figure 1.3) is located under the root ZIID, within the Momentaneous Aspect sub-entry, the D-classifier sub-sub-entry, and the thematic prefix ádádii- (see Figure 1.5). Full word forms are reached only after following these analytical steps (Root (ZIID) > Aspect (Momentaneous) > Classifier (D-classifier) > Prefixes ('ádádii) > Conjugation prefixes in Position VII (Ø for imperfective and Ø for perfective). However, the entry provides only the imperfective and perfective verb forms. The remaining modes (Iterative, Future, and Optative) are predictable through the conjugation tables in the Appendix or by consulting the corresponding entry in the 1987 dictionary, whose page number (e.g., p. 7) is indicated after the conjugation prefixes (Ø/Ø). This is shown in Figure 1.5.

(4) 'ádádii-(Ø/Ø)(7): to take a sip or swallow of O, take a dose of O (as medicine). 'Ádádiisdzǝ́ǝd/ 'ádádiisdziid ('ádánáádiisdzǝ́ǝd). (di-thematic: oral.) (Cf. yaassǝ́ǝd = ya-yiissǝ́ǝd: A[1]33 above.)

In contrast, the 1987 volume lists fully inflected forms without analytically separating thematic/derivational prefixes. Consequently, verbs from the same stem but different aspects appear in separate entries. For instance, bik'éssid 'to pour it over it'; (Figure 1.6) and 'ádádiisdzǝ́ǝd (Figure 1.3) are listed separately in the 1987 dictionary (under "B. CONCLUSIVE" and "A. MOMENTANEOUS" respectively), despite sharing the stem ZIID. In the Analytical Lexicon, they are also listed separately (Figure 1.7) but unified under the same stem ZIID which is distinguished by aspect ('ádádiisdziíd under Momentaneous, bik'éssid under Conclusive).

The cross-referencing between the two works, where the Analytical lexicon provides page numbers to the 1987 dictionary, makes them indispensable companion tools. For this corpus project, both were used extensively. The 1987 volume provided attested word forms and conjugation patterns, while the Analytical lexicon supplied crucial information on stems and lexical aspect, which was included in the gloss.

1.3.3.4 The bipartite approach (McDonough 1995)

We have seen that by abandoning the templatic approach to verbs, prefixes are still distinguished from stems, either in a prefix string that is already conjugated (Young & Morgan 1987) or a thematic prefix string (Young et al. 1992). An additional non-templatic analysis is the Bipartite Constituent Model (McDonough 1995), which is informed by phonological boundaries of surface forms. It proposes that the Navajo verb is built from two core morphological constituents, and a third, outer domain for disjunct clitics. The schema below is adapted from McDonough (1995: 28):

[Disjunct Domain # (Agreement) [Inflectional Constit.] [Verb Constit.]]_{Word}

Where:

- Disjunct Domain: Clitic-like elements (adverbials, postpositions) attach to the left edge of the core compound. This corresponds to Positions 0-III in the templatic model.
- Inflectional Constituent: Contains a portmanteau INFL stem (tense/mode/subject) and qualifier prefixes, with object agreement prefixes added if verbs are transitive. (Positions IV-VIII of the template)
- Verb Constituent: Contains the verb stem and classifier prefixes. (Positions IX and X of the template)

This model challenges the slot-and-filler template by arguing that phonological evidence points to strong structural boundaries between the two core constituents. Furthermore, grammatical information like tense, mode and subject agreement is fused into single, portmanteau constituents such as the inflectional and verb stem. McDonough (1995) argues for the bipartite model primarily on learnability grounds. She claims the verb structure must be transparent to learners and that morphological information should be recoverable from phonetics and phonology. This morphological and phonological transparency is best communicated when assuming this fundamental distinction between the INFL and verb constituent, which aligns with the minimal disyllabic requirement for verbs (see Speas 1984). The position-class template, in contrast, is an abstract descriptive tool not reflected in lexical patterns or phonological evidence, making it an implausible model for acquisition.

Adopting this learnability perspective, our glossing strategy for the corpus is deliberately surface-oriented. This approach, designed to enhance accessibility for Navajo speakers, is informed both by McDonough's surface-based model and by our adherence to the conventions of the Young and Morgan dictionaries. The rationale for this combined approach is detailed in Section 1.4.

1.3.4 Syntax

The syntax of Navajo does not exhibit many rigid rules or unpredictable behaviors. Navajo is a verb-final language, with agents generally preceding patients; however, the overt expression of both roles in transitive sentences is quite rare. Grammatical relations involving at least one speech act participant (1st or 2nd person) follow a nominative-accusative alignment marked on the verb. In scenarios with only non-speech act participants, object agreement depends on the animacy and topicality of the referents. According to Willie (2000), for third-person referents, entities of higher animacy precede those of lower animacy. Whether higher-ranked entities act on lower-ranked entities or vice versa, i.e., the grammatical roles of agent and patient, is determined by special third-person object agreement on verbs (yi- vs. bi-, respectively). This is shown in example (3). Here, ‘boy’ ranks higher than ‘horse’.

1 Preliminaries

- (3) a. 'Ashkii łíí' yiztal
 'ashkii łíí' yi-z-tal
 boy horse 3.YI-3.SI.PERF-kick.PERF

 'ashkii łíí' bi-z-tal
 boy horse 3.BI-3.SI.PERF-kick.PERF
 A P V
 ‘The boy was kicked by the horse.’ [Adapted from Willie 2000: 364]

If the agent and patient rank equally in animacy, the order can be flexible, but topicalized entities always precede those that are focused. For this reason, Navajo is considered a “Topic-Focus-Verb” language rather than a “Subject-Object-Verb” language.

In addition, Navajo is a pro-drop language. The influential Pronominal Argument Hypothesis (Sandoval & Jelinek 1989) applied to Navajo (Speas 1990, Hale 2006) argues that the verbal agreement prefixes constitute a non-configurational clause, with free nominals as adjuncts. Consequently, the traditional concept of a “verb phrase” is not fully applicable to Navajo, as verbs alone can constitute entire clauses. However, Willie & Jelinek (1995) argue for configurationality on the discourse level since the order Topic-Focus-V is consistent. Hale (2001) accounts for configurationality within the verb and posits morphological vP nodes. Beyond the clause, Hale & Perkins (1977) propose phrase structure trees for multiple utterances, showing that while the clausal syntax is flat, there is great complexity within noun phrases, and within verbs. They identify the following phrases: Clause, Noun Phrase, Postpositional Phrase, Enclitic Phrase.

A noun phrase consists of a noun or pronoun, with additional modifiers that may precede or follow the head noun. Property concepts that modify nouns follow the noun, and since many derive from verbal expressions, the category of “adjective” is also not clearly applicable. In noun phrases, possessor nouns precede possessed nouns, and the possessed noun carries a prefix that agrees in person and number with the possessor. A complex noun phrase exhibiting a deverbal noun with multiple modifiers is given in (4).

- (4) Díí chidí naat'a'í 'ayóí 'ádaniltsxooígíí bitsiits'iin

 TH-DISTR-TH-l-be.very.big.NEU.IMPF=PRES.REF 3.POSS-head
 deverbal_adjective possessed_noun
 'These big planes' motors.' [modified from Text I: 135]

This structure is mirrored in postpositional phrases, where the modified noun follows the postposition, which similarly displays a prefix that agrees in person and number with that noun. Postpositions, however, can also act as adverbs or even be incorporated into the verb, inheriting the agreement prefix.

- (5) beeldléi yee 'ákászaazgo

 'blanket wrapped around his middle.' (lit. 'with the blanket it is belted around himself.') [Text A: 210]

Because the prefixes on possessed nouns and postpositions are identical to object prefixes in verbs, nouns, postpositions and verbs are morphologically connected, which blurs the distinction between different parts of speech. Additionally, enclitics may attach to any of these word classes or phrases. In terms of negation, Navajo employs a preverbal negative marker, often coupled with a second marker at the end of the sentence, creating a bipartite negation structure:

- (6) 'Éí bízhi'ígíí dóó shash jíníí da
 'Éí bí-zhi'=ígíí doo shash ji-níí da

1.4 Glossing approach in the Navajo Corpus of Historical Narratives

Throughout the scholarly tradition of Navajo and Athabaskan languages, linguists have typically avoided exhaustive segmentation, focusing only on categories pertinent to the specific discussion (Denk 2024; Hargus et al. 2020). This prioritizes practicality, often simplifying glosses to the word level or omitting morphological detail due to space constraints and audience needs. For instance, the Navajo Conversational Corpus (Mithun 2009-2014) provides only free translations, and even Young & Morgan (1987) refrain from full morphemic glossing in narrative examples. As mentioned previously, the central analytical challenge is the morphological structure itself, where lexical, derivational, and inflectional information is spread across verb positions, making a consistent morpheme-based approach inherently difficult.

To address this, Denk & Chee (2025) developed a glossing strategy for the Navajo Corpus of Historical Narratives (NCHN) that balances linear analysis with faithfulness to surface structure. The corpus implements this through several annotation tiers:

- Word: Presents Navajo words as they appear in the narrative, with minimal corrections for typographical errors.
- Morpheme: Displays morphemes in their surface forms (morphs), segmented with hyphens for affixes and equal signs for clitics.
- Lexical Entry: Represents the underlying forms of morphemes, with one form chosen as the headword, often based on its first occurrence in the corpus.
- Lexical Gloss: Provides grammatical information and English translations following the Leipzig Glossing Rules.
- Lexical Grammatical Information: Specifies word-class information for stems and affixes (e.g., verbal stem (v), preverbs (PRVB), postpositions (post)).
- Word Gloss: Gives an English gloss for the entire word, capturing its compositional meaning.
- Free Translation: Provides a sentence-level English translation, typically retaining the original from the source narratives, unless it has been revised for the sake of clarity; in such cases, this is indicated in square brackets.

An example of glossing is given below (the Free Translation tier is omitted as this is a single word):

from NCHN (A Childhood Tale; John C. Claw; 13.26)

Word:	ndahaazbááz
Morphemes:	n-	da-	haa-	z-	bááz
Lex. Entries:	ni- ₅	da- ₃	h- ₁	si- ₁	bááz
Lex. Gloss:	TH	DISTR	SER	3.SI.PERF	roll.PERF
Lex. Gr. Info:	v:PRVB	Att. to any cat.	v:QUAL	v:AMS	v
Word Gloss:	they rolled it one after another up to a point

As shown, the word ndahaazbááz is linearly segmented and glossed, and abandons distributional or holistic word glosses. Consequently, Young and Morgan’s templatic positions became a valuable tool for linearly assigning morphemes. However, we also oriented the linear analysis to the surface structure, similar to McDonough’s (1995) bipartite approach, and abandoned numerical positions. Instead, we clustered morphs from the Lexical Gloss tier into functionally defined categories of the Lexical Grammatical Information tier. These categories align with the template but involve different clustering, as shown in Figure 1.8.

The glossing strategy is governed by three underlying principles:

1. Surface Faithfulness: Do not change the shape of morphs while segmenting.

Morphemes are segmented in their surface form. For example, nda-haazbááz is segmented as n-da-haa-z-bááz. Variant forms like the seriative haa- are registered as allomorphs of a single lexical entry (e.g., h-), with the first corpus instance typically chosen as the headword. In an approach that adopted the Young and Morgan template strictly, this word would be segmented as $ni^I-da^{III}-hi^{VI}-si^{IV}-\emptyset^{VIII}-\emptyset^{IX}-bááz^X$ (with numbers of positions in superscript).

2. Category Faithfulness: Keep number of categories and morphs in a manageable range, and do not merge or split them.

This principle streamlines annotation by consolidating morpheme categories to a manageable set, reducing redundancy while ensuring consistent assignment. It overrides exhaustive segmentation where fusion is systematic. For instance, the diverse thematic and adverbial morphemes from positions Ib(2,3)-e in Young and Morgan's template are grouped as a single Preverb (PRVB) category. This grouping of similar categories also applies to postpositions, where freestanding and verb-incorporated forms are glossed identically, as in the following example:⁶

from NCHN (The Trouble at Round Rock; Mexican Clansman; 36.1)

beeldléi	y-	ee	'á-	ká	s-	zaaz	=go
beeldléi	y ₋₁	ee	'á ₋₃	káá' ₁	si ₋₁	zaaz ₁	=go blanket	3.YI.POSS	with	REFL.POSS	on	3.SI.PERF	belt.NEU.PERF	=SUB
n	any	post	any cat.	post	v:AMS	v	prt cat.
blanket	with it
blanket	wrapped around his middle

Similarly, aspect, mood, and subject markers (from Young and Morgan's positions VIc, VII, and VIII) are fused into a single Aspect-Mood-Subject (AMS) category (aspect, mood, and subject) because they often merge into unsegmentable portmanteau morphs (e.g., s- for 3.SI.PERF). This grouping, acknowledging the fusional nature of this domain as suggested by McDonough's (1995) bipartite model, facilitates annotation and retrieval. An example of two consolidated positions is the category of the Areal (AR). These two subject and object uses of the prefix ha-/ho-/h- do not co-occur, ⁶One difference between the glossed text presented in this volume and the corpus is that incorporated postpositions are still hyphen-segmented here, whereas in the corpus they are treated as stems. Without the hyphen, two morphemes such as ká and s- would be conflated as kás- in the current text, whereas with the hyphen they appear as ká-s-. In FLEx, by contrast, the separation is maintained through spaces and multiple tiers of annotation – a level of detail this volume does not display. Instead of splitting up one word into two words, this approach preserves the integrity of the word as it appears in the original text.

and therefore, this prefix has been assigned a single category. Similarly, paradigms that share structural features, like the usitative/imperfective or future/progressive within the AMS category, are glossed as one (imperfective and progressive, respectively).

3. Form-Meaning Exhaustion: Segment as much as possible and assign as much meaning as possible to segmented parts.

Words are segmented down to single morphs, but not below the surface level. This can lead to what would be a single category in a distributed/holistic approach being annotated in multiple tiers. A clear example is the future paradigm: forms like díí- (2SG.FUT) are segmented as d-íí and glossed as FUT-2.SG.PROG. This reflects its structural composition from a future marker plus the progressive paradigm as seen in Table 5.

Table 1.5: Future paradigm compared to progressive paradigm (Young et al. 1992: 907,910). The letter C denotes any thematic consonant preceding the morpheme sequence.

	FUTURE	PROGRESSIVE
1SG	deesh-	Ceesh-
2SG	díí-	Cíí-
3	doo-	Coo-
1DU/PL	dii(d)-	Cii(d)-
2DU/PL	doo(h)	Coo(h)-

This grouping, again, avoids the need for a separate, fully inflected future paradigm (aligning with Category Faithfulness). In addition, a similar principle is used for verb stems, which are glossed for specific sub-aspects (e.g., NEU.IMPF) based on the stem tables in Young et al. (1992).

In summary, we annotated words according to a linear analysis that oriented itself on the template but included as much grammatical information as possible, resulting in multiple annotation of categories in verbs, without over-exhausting the number of categories. Thus, different from Young and Morgan's analyses of verbs (fully conjugated vs. verb themes), we retained linearity in segmenting the verbs but glossed some the segmented morphs according to categories that might be otherwise considered distributed (such as Continuative, which we glossed for the prefix and the stem). These principles resulted in a practical, user-friendly annotation system that aligns with the template of Young and Morgan while simplifying the relationship between morpheme form and category.

This entire consideration of morpheme glossing and the multiple tiers that we applied to the corpus are essential to understanding the segmentation and glossing in this publication for Open Text Collections, even when more technical tiers like Lexical Entry and Lexical Grammatical Information are omitted. We acknowledge that the glossing of Navajo and other Dene languages is a controversial issue, not only culturally but technically (Hargus et al. 2020; Denk 2024). Nevertheless, we opted for the continuation of the linear approach that we have developed in the corpus because we think that the glossing tier Lexical Gloss best captures the categories that a reader is interested in, whether they believe Navajo’s categories are templatic or distributed. Readers are encouraged to read the Corpus Guidelines on the webpage of the corpus (<https://digitalrepository.unm.edu/navajocorpus/1/>) to get a better understanding of the different glossing conventions.

1.5 Provenance

This publication presents texts from the March 2025 version of the morphologically annotated Navajo Corpus of Historical Narratives (Denk & Chee 2025). The corpus contains Navajo texts that were originally selected, transcribed, and published by Robert W. Young and William Morgan, two foundational figures in Navajo linguistic documentation. The texts come from two collections: The trouble at Round Rock (1952) and Navajo historical selections (1954), each published by the U.S. Bureau of Indian Affairs. Their works focused on documenting and preserving narratives relevant to Navajo history, culture, and language, as well as introducing accessible Navajo language texts to broader audiences. The Navajo Corpus of Historical Narratives expands on their legacy by providing annotated translations that allow for more detailed linguistic analysis. Any additions, changes, or omissions in the free translation are indicated by square brackets in the corpus, and these markings are retained in the “English translation” section for each text in this volume.

1.5.1 Ethics

This publication ensures respect for the rights of all contributors and the communities whose narratives and linguistic data are represented. The historical narratives analyzed in this work ultimately originate from Navajo authors from the late 19th and early 20th centuries and have therefore a primary connection to the Navajo community. Through the scholarship of 'Ádahoónítigíí and Young and Morgan, these texts have been made available to broader audiences. The ethical considerations of that time are not clear.

To ensure compliance with copyright and permissions, due diligence has been conducted regarding the legal status of these materials. Correspondence with relevant administrative bodies, including the Indian Bureau of Education, has indicated that these works are in the public domain, and additional confirmation has been sought from the U.S. Copyright Office to ensure the publication's adherence to copyright regulations. Given these findings, the decision has been made to publish this work as an open-access resource, to ensure accessibility and scholarly integrity.

1.5.2 Young and Morgan's historical selections

The selected narratives from Young & Morgan (1952, 1954) offer perspectives on historical events and daily life at the end of the 19th century. Texts from The trouble at Round Rock (1952) focus on a specific historical incident, namely a dispute involving Agent Shipley and Black Horse, set against the social and economic backdrop of the Navajo Nation. The narratives from Navajo historical selections (1954) cover a broader range of topics, including traditional stories and individual experiences that contribute to a more nuanced understanding of Navajo life and worldview. The narratives chosen for this corpus reflect our intention to represent a broad number of topics that could serve as a basis for studying different narrative styles.

1.5.3 Selection criteria

The selection process focused on ensuring diverse representation across different themes and perspectives within the Navajo community. From The trouble at Round Rock, all relevant texts were included to provide a complete view of the central historical incident described. For Navajo historical selections, texts were chosen to represent each part of the thematic volume, focusing on narratives that include traditional stories, social commentary, personal anecdotes, and historical insights. This includes different narrative styles, such as first- and third-person perspectives.

1.6 Genres, styles and main themes

The genres within the corpus range from historical accounts and adventure tales to traditional narratives and personal recollections. Narrative styles vary accordingly, with some texts taking on formal, descriptive tones, while others exhibit conversational or introspective qualities. The variation in genres and narrative voices provides a broad spectrum of discursive forms, including dialogue, descriptive passages, and self-reflective commentary. The corpus thus promotes, if limited, a diverse representation of themes from the larger pool of narratives, and is a valuable resource for studying Navajo grammar, stylistics, and narrative construction, as well as for understanding the cultural contexts in which these narratives are embedded. The main themes of the narratives are discussed in Section 1.8.

1.7 Speakers/narrators

As listed above, the narrators include both named individuals and anonymous voices. Texts in The trouble at Round Rock feature historical figures recounting first-hand experiences, while selections from Navajo historical selections highlight a range of storytellers, including John C. Claw and Tony Tsosie, who bring personal history and traditional knowledge to life. In addition, it is worth mentioning that traditional knowledge, even if kept distinct from individual tales, exhibits the diversity of families passing these stories to their offspring and therefore also personal accounts and interpretations. As such, the authorship of traditional stories includes an entire chain of past narrators.

1.8 Main themes

The texts enumerated story above in Table 1.6, exhibit the following main themes, portrayed in Table 1.7.

Table 1.7: Distribution of main themes across the narratives

MAIN THEMES	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I
HISTORICAL EVENTS	x	x	x				x	x	x
POLITICS	x	x	x				x	x
INDIVIDUAL EXPERIENCE	x					x	x	x	x
ADVENTURE						x			x
TRADITIONAL KNOWLEDGE				x	x	x

The main themes are well distributed across the corpus, focusing on experiences on the individual and collective level. In the following, these themes will be commented on in relation to the texts.

1.8.1 Historical events and politics

The trouble at Round Rock versions (Texts A, B, C) focus on historical events and political tensions affecting the Navajo people during the late 19th century. The core of these stories revolves around the conflict between Agent Shipley and Black Horse, which instantiates broader socio-political struggles and the tensions arising from U.S. government encroachment. These narratives not only recount specific incidents but also show the effects of imposed policies on the Navajo way of life and governance. They highlight clan leaders and influential community members who are forced to act due to external pressures, providing a Navajo account on the political resistance.

The Navajo historical selections volume offers additional political commentary, notably in Our abuse (Text G) and The special grazing regulation (Text H). These narratives focus less on the unfolding of historical events but instead more on government-imposed regulations and their consequences for Navajo lands and livelihoods at the time of narration. Dan Phillips, for instance, describes the hardships and frustrations of the Navajo community as they faced restrictive grazing regulations, which drastically altered traditional livestock practices. These stories account for the ongoing tension between Navajo self-governance and federal oversight, tying back to earlier conflicts like The trouble at Round Rock. Finally, Tim Yazzie's account on his flight over the Navajo Nation to deliver aid (Text I) relates to the historical "Blizzard of 1949" and intersects with the livestock reduction policies.

1.8.2 Individual experiences and adventures

Individual adventures are recounted in many of these narratives and provide personal perspectives on broader historical themes. For instance, A childhood tale by John C. Claw (Text F) describes formative events and challenges faced by the narrator during his early years and highlights how historical events intersected with personal development. Similarly, I flew over Navajo land by Tim Yazzie (Text I) offers a more immediate account of adventure and the dangers of being on a plane mission. Yazzie's narrative stands out for its sense of freedom and exploration, as he describes the landscapes and people he encountered from an airplane, providing an almost ethereal view of his homeland. These personal reflections lend an intimate tone to what is also a historical event, namely the severe Blizzard of 1949. Furthermore, the stories Our abuse (Text E) and The special grazing regulation (Text H) provide individual insights into the hardships faced during the Livestock Reduction Policies. Lastly, the first version of The trouble at Round Rock (Text A) can also be regarded as an individual experience, since Left-Handed Mexican Clansman was present during the fight between Black Horse and Agent Shipley.

1.8.3 Traditional knowledge

In The traditional Navajo country (Text D), the anonymous narrator explores the Navajo connection to their land and emphasizes the cultural and spiritual significance of the geography around them. This piece promotes traditional knowledge, as the narrator details the mountains, plants, and animals with reverence and precision. By narrating the symbolic meaning and traditional uses of different elements in the environment, this text helps understand Navajo cosmology and the land as a source of identity and wisdom.

Similarly, The first mother-in-law narrative (Text E) emphasizes traditional customs, such as family roles, marriage, and respect for elders and deities. These stories are not only informative but also preserve the cultural practices and beliefs that define Navajo social life. Tony Tsosie's perspective sheds light on the dynamics of family relations and their societal expectations. Also, John C. Claw's childhood story (Text F) incorporates elements like taboos which can be counted as part of the traditional narrative inventory.

Having established the main themes of the collection, the focus now turns to the primary sources themselves. Part II, allows these works to speak for themselves, giving the reader direct access to their voices and stories in full detail.

A.1 Summary & background

This narrative portrays escalating tension between the Navajo leader Black Horse and the Navajo Agent Dana Shipley. Agent Shipley is sent to Round Rock to execute the law passed in 1887 according to which all children needed to attend school. The fight starts with verbal exchanges and intensifies into physical confrontation, until Black Horse challenges the authority. Amid the chaos, notable figures, including Sucker and Chee Dodge, strive to temper Black Horse's aggression and mediate peace. When soldiers arrive, both sides brace for conflict, yet the appearance of a War Chief (Officer) shifts the course, leading Black Horse to lay down his weapon and extend a handshake to signal the end of hostilities.

This version focuses on the immediacy of the conflict as a fierce struggle for identity and collective resistance and is therefore more politically charged than the other versions of the Trouble at Round Rock. Left-Handed Mexican Clansman, a witness to this historical event, presents Black Horse as a heroic figure who battles against the colonial forces with emotional stakes involved in the struggle over education. Concluding with Íldáq t'ah chqmq'ii nishlįigo, éi t'éiyá biniiyé 'áadi 'atah nahashle' ('At that time, I was just a young punk – that's probably why I was just there with the crowd for fun'), the author suggests that his perspective on the event may have evolved since then.

A.2 English translation

My forbears, the old men and women folk, were of the Mexican People Clan. With great hardship they came back from the place called Fort Sumner, packing their goods on their backs, and afterward lived here at Lukachukai. Here they began life anew. Then from their home at a place called Spring in the Clay they started moving over and across yonder mountain. While they were making this move they stopped for the night, and it is said that I was born where they halted.

Let's see, I believe it was in the month of October I was born on a night when a heavy snow had begun to fall. My grandfather, a man by the name of White Mexican Clansman, and another man called The Son of Former Sweathouse, were the only men. They and several womenfolk worked hard on me.

My grandfather had a fine wether goat that he was quite proud of. He killed it there, and the people feasted with great joy. Then on the day following the night of my birth we again started to move. In those days people went about only on horseback or afoot.

On the day following the night on which she gave birth to me, my mother went on foot as far as the people moved that day. And since it had snowed the night before they had to go through the snow. It is remarkable how risky life was in those days. Nowadays when a woman gives birth they take special care of her, telling her not to catch cold. Back at that time it was different.

As time went on I somehow grew up. I do not remember much about it. I do not remember in detail much of what happened before I was about ten years old. When morning would come and I would be sleeping nicely, my grandfather would throw me out of bed.

"Come on! Come on! Why are you lying down? Go run a race. If you're weak the first harmful thing that comes along will run over you. If you are strong you will lie huddled in death only after the dirt is torn and furrowed around you (i.e. you will give up only after a struggle)," my grandfather used to tell me. The old folks all used to say that.

They probably said this because they knew of the wars that were going on. That is the way my grandfather drove me about and spoke to me. He did not speak in anger. He did not speak harshly. He told it to me in a nice way. So that is the way I spent my days from that time on.

After I had reached the age of eighteen I did various kinds of odd jobs. I had an uncle by the name of Forked House. He was a young man, and he adopted me. He started sending me on chores. I would take care of his horses for him. He had a wagon and a team. He would tell me to haul wood with it, or to work with it.

At the time I was about eighteen years old the person who started the present trading post at Blue Clay Point moved there – I used to know just when it was. They used to call the Former Old Interpreter (Chee Dodge) Chee (Red) when I first heard of him. Chee was a good friend of a white man from Ugly House (Manuelito, N.M.) known as Big Lump Setting Up (S.E. Aldrich). Finally the two of them built the trading post at the place called Blue Clay Point. It was in the Spring when they moved there. There was an epidemic in progress, and we now refer to it as "the time when the throat killed many." It was at that time, in the spring, that they moved to Blue Clay Point, it was said. That is how it came about that the one who would be called The Interpreter (Chee Dodge) and the one who would be named Big Lump Setting Up came to move there.

They built the trading post and four years later perhaps, I do not recall exactly when, the one I called my uncle told us to haul wood there. They (the traders) probably called for the wood. There was a boy of the Big Water Clan with whom I always chummed around. We started doing that kind of work. We went about calling each other "younger brother," and we hauled wood to the trading post. We heard reports that there were people going about to get children put into school. It was said that they were then over at Chinle, and we heard that they were coming here sometime soon. We would discuss it when we took the wagon after wood.

"Say, let's go to school," I said to my companion.

"All right," he said.

And we went about, talking enthusiastically about it. In the evening after we had unloaded another load of wood we started back home in the wagon. When we got back to the hogan we found that my uncle was there. And it turned out that my grandfather, who was called Big Mexican Clansman, was there too. So we told them of our plan. "They are putting children in school, it is said." We told them how we had both said, "Let's go to school."

"It's probably all right. It's fine indeed, my children. A party is in its way coming to us. You cannot escape them anyway," my uncle and my grandfather said to us.

On the next day we went to the trading post, and my grandfather put his thumbprint on a paper for us. It was reported that the children from Chinle who were being taken to school would get there in two days, and we heard the grownups talking to one another about it.

Of those menfolk who were talking to one another about it, one was called Weela. He lived over behind Round Rock and was one of the leaders at that time. One was called Bead Clan Gambler, and he was a member of the police force. He was a very strong, husky man. He was from Chinle, but he was a member of the police force at Fort Defiance. He had come on ahead with the white man from Fort Defiance called Little Chief (Agent Dana Shipley). It was there that my grandfather spoke and promised us.

"I am putting these two boys in school," he said by way of promise.

Since it was reported that it would be another day before the wagon load of children would arrive, we went back home. We spent the night there and then returned on foot.

And we found that the children had arrived. There was some man of the Bitter Water Clan whom people called Pug Nose. He was going around with the party, taking care of the children. He knew a little English, and that was probably why he was told to take care of the children. He was busily running around the children who had been hauled in, chattering in English. He was keeping them together. The children from Blue Clay Point who were to be put in school had not all been brought in as yet. It was said that the wagon with the children would start off in two days. They were to go by way of Lukachukai, Tsaille, and Crystal, and on over to Fort Defiance. That was probably their plan.

But the people who live over beyond yonder mountain in the area of Cove and Red Rock were thinking ugly thoughts about the plan in connection with education. It is just recently that these people became old men, and they have all died. At that time, when they acted as they did, they were young men. They said that if this business of taking children to school got to them they would really do something about it. As we came to find out, they were saying that (the school) would not get a one of their children. A man by the name of Black Horse was the leader of that faction. They had no doubt heard that in a certain number of days a party would come to Blue Clay Point for the purpose of putting children in school. So they began to think of the matter with bitterness.

"Boys, let's go there. Come on!", they probably said. So they probably set out from there for this purpose (of opposing the placing of children in school). We had not heard of this and knew nothing about it. They met (the school party) at Blue Clay Point.

Near the trading post there was a house which at that time, we called the Ugly House. The house served the purpose of providing a place to sleep for the people who came to the trading post. Black Horse's party went over there, and they no doubt came with evil thoughts. The people who lived hereabout had heard nothing of their plans but at night they spoke about themselves, revealing their intentions.

The one I referred to as my grandfather, and another uncle of mine called Little Boy, apparently went there at night and heard them telling about it. Among those present were the men known as Black Horse, Limper, Tall Red House Clansman, Old Bead Chant Singer – who was of the Red House Clan – and his cousin, a Bitter Water Clansman called Bead Chant's Nephew, and another man with whom I was merely acquainted, and who was a relative of mine by marriage. His name was Yellow Fermentive Chewer. These are the only ones I can remember of those who came from there (on the other side of the mountain). I do not remember who the rest were. They probably planned to go in to see the Agent on the next day. They no doubt told what they thought – what their opinions were regarding this school business that had started in connection with us. They told these things to the people from here who had gathered. So people began to think along the lines of their planning. "Now men, is there anyone here who can do it (a chant)? Long ago, people of old had a story of some kind of chant called 'Talk One Into the Grave.' Who of you knows it?" said Black Horse, asking that it be performed.

These people from the other side of the mountain were saying this. This is what that is what I heard. I wasn't at the meeting myself. And I don't know just how this chant goes.

"I do," said the one I referred to as Little Boy.

"Two of you are needed for it," said Black Horse.

So then my grandfather, the man I spoke of as Big Mexican Clansman, volunteered to join him to carry on the ceremony. South from the trading post there is a ruin which we call in Navajo "Shattered House." Someone burned it long ago. It is said that they were Anasazi. It is black there like ashes. It was there that they carried on the ceremony. I don't know how it was done. That is what took place that night. As for us, we spent another night at my uncle's hogan. Today we had been placed among children who were to be taken off to school. On the morrow we would start off with them. So for that purpose, in the morning we again started off from the hogan afoot. We left with menfolk, with the one who would thumbprint the papers for us and who would vouch for us. It was my grandfather, Big Mexican Clansman. He stood up for the two of us.

When we got to the store we found that many people had assembled. Many horses were standing about. At that time horses were the only means people had for transportation. Some of us did not know what had been done the night before. Someone by the name of Black Horse had brought a party from the other side of the mountain. That is all that we found out.

We were told that now there would be work here making out papers for more of our children. There were three Navajo policemen there in that connection. One of them turned out to be Bead Clan Gambler, one was Singed Man from Fort Defiance – he was also known as Son of Former Rag Man. Another was Interpreter's (i.e. Chee Dodge's) brother-in-law, a Red Streak Into Water Clansman. This man was killed recently at St. Michaels at a rodeo. He was killed by a racehorse on the track during the race. At that time he was a policeman. I can't think what his name was – I merely knew him by sight. He was merely called Interpreter's Father-in-law: He was a policeman back at that time. So there were three policemen. It happened that way. Then we were told that the time had come. We saw the people going inside the trading post, so we just went with the crowd. We two who were going to school stayed together. As for the rest of the children who were going to school, I don't know anything about them.

At the time we had brought the last load of wood; while we were unloading it we noticed two women leading a horse nearby. They were probably on their way home. One of these women had promised her son for school. [His name was Toohnii and she had promised him for school] The woman glanced our way. Her name was Red Buttock Clan Woman. She is still living and her hair is white. As she passed by she said, "It is said that those boys who are unloading wood over there have been promised for school – they will go to school too. Golly, why they are big enough to be of use here now", she said of us. I don't know what she had in mind in so saying. We just laughed about it afterward. But that was right. We had volunteered for school. We were going to get an education. We considered school as good news. That was what I thought. I always told my friend about what I myself was thinking. "You see, it's something to strive for and covet. Look at Chee's trading post here. Quite some time ago when they moved back from Fort Sumner he had a hard time. He started his life by poking around in the horse manure in a stable. He used to be out there early in the morning with a stick especially made for that purpose. He could be seen sitting out there silhouetted against the sun, with the light shining red through his hair. This is how he came to be called Chee (Red). Then some white people took him in. That is how he got his start in life. That is how his mind began to develop. He got ahead and now here he is in his enviable position. He knows English", I said. That is what I had an ambition to do at that time. It was for that reason that I volunteered myself for school. And the person who had joined me thought likewise. With this in mind I wanted an education badly then. But it was destined to turn out differently.

The people went into the trading post. It was packed full. Over here on one side the counter ran. Further back in the room was a swinging gate. It was out through there that Chee came. The brother of The One Who Has Eyeglasses (John Lorenzo Hubell) from Ganado, a man called the Bat, was a clerk there. He was over to one side behind the counter. The Bat was a man who could understand Navajo very well. A little later the one called Little Chief (Shipley) came out and stopped beside Chee. Chee was his interpreter as he began to make a speech to the people. Black Horse was standing against the counter over to one side. The people of his band were standing with him. The people who had promised their children for school were named, and we were told many things about the school.

Then Black Horse spoke up and said, "This business of taking children away from people to put them in school – when is it going to affect the people from over beyond the mountain?", [he said].

"It will reach you sometime. Tomorrow these will start out and will be routed right along the mountainside", said Little Chief (Shipley)

"We'll not give you a one of our children. And we'd just as soon fight over the matter as not", said Black Horse balking stubbornly.

Speaking this way to each other the Agent and Black Horse exchanged many words.

The one I referred to as Limper was standing near Black Horse with a blanket wrapped around his middle. And those of this band were lined up, one behind the other.

“Come on, you boys. Remember what you said,” said Black Horse.

The one called Limper was the first to hop in there, and he grabbed the Agent by the collar. Then they all rushed in. Chee jumped over the gate at the back of the room, and chaos followed. “Outside with him!” voices were saying.

They started out with him. As they were taking him outside I crawled and squeezed myself out among them. Just then they locked the door from the inside. Two of the boys who were going to go to school were locked in. The one I referred to as River Man, who is now known as Short Hair, and another boy with him. These were the ones who were locked inside. On account of this fact the man I spoke of as Weela took the Agent’s side – it was because one of the boys locked in there was his son.

The mob was carrying the Agent away. Not far from there, there was a drop. There was a wash in the blue clay with a point of land on either side. That is how the trading post got its name. It was a long drop. “Throw him down there! [Down there, down there!]” voices were heard saying.

A lot of people were standing alongside the trading post, and I among them. My uncle was standing beside me, and I don’t remember who else was standing there. As the people carried the Agent along they beat him with their fists. They were beating him up. But as they carried him further away the one called Bead Clan Gambler went running from here where we were standing.¹

Over to one side of Black Horse the people were merely milling around. All of them had their horses standing there nearby. Many more joined him, and among these were some women. These women too had spent the night there with them. They had stayed to cook for the men. One of these women had come from over beyond the mountain. I don’t know exactly where she came from.

When this happened Black Horse’s henchmen spoke without effect because there were others who were trying to keep order and who said “No” to the proposal to attack the soldiers.

¹The English translation in Young & Morgan (1952: 27-29) continues here with approximately two pages of narrative describing additional events surrounding the fight, including the most violent scenes. Because no corresponding Navajo text is provided in the original source, these passages have been omitted from the present edition. The translation resumes at the next point where the Navajo original is available.

I was one of those who came back (on the next day) to where the people were. And I found that the people from beyond the mountain – those among whom the news had been spread, and who were sent for – had arrived. They had guns and bows and arrows. These were many people. There were also many of us who had joined in just as spectators.

A man of the Salty Water Clan whose name was Slender Lava had his family there, and his wife cooked all night for the men who were making the trouble. In the morning the women again prepared food for them. Then the people noticed that the soldiers were moving along over there.

“All right now! All right! We’ll take them right over there in the flat. All right now! Before they move in! Before they move in! Let’s get them!” said Black Horse dashing about but without effect.

But his boys were really impatient. They were rubbing their guns. Then the one to whom I referred as Slender Lava said, “No!” He spoke thus because he knew they lacked the wherewithal to win the fight. A man of the Water’s Edge Clan, called Sucker, also said, “No!” And of the men from hereabout with whom I came and who I mentioned before, my uncle joined in saying, “No.”

“Wait. Wait. Speak no more like that, my Elders, my friends,” people said, opposing them.

Then the person whom I said was known as Sucker was sent to the trading post. The soldiers moved into the trading post. They had pack mules, And there was a line of these animals far into the distance. I don’t remember what the number of the soldiers who arrived was said to be. I can’t recollect. But when they had moved into the past, Sucker was sent over there. Presently he came back from there on horseback.

“They say to wait, boys. They say to wait,” she said.

Then Black Horse’s boys really became impatient. They sent Sucker back over there again.

“Go over there now and tell them, ‘No’. Tell them not to give us that kind of talk.

Tell them it’s going to be now. We’ll tear the building to pieces. What can they do? Go tell them that’s our answer,” said Black Horse.

Sucker galloped over there and told them that, and then he returned at a gallop.

“They tell you to wait. The one who says that is the leader of those solders who arrived and he is a War Chief (Officer). It is not the man you threw out yesterday who is saying that,” he said as he ran back again on horseback.

Then the men over on this side said, “It’s a fact. You never know. You don’t know what they have in mind in saying this – they might have a better idea for settling it. So don't say anything," said those on this side who were acting as go-betweens.

Finally many of us started over there, some on foot and some on horseback. We got to the trading post. The soldiers were there on the inside. There were many pack mules, more than twenty I guess. They had all been inside the wool storage shack, with their packs still on. Across from the wool storage shack a gun had been placed to cover its approaches. So in case Black Horse carried out his threat, the soldiers were ready.

Sucker rode over there to where Black Horse and his band were.

['Now you can come over',] the War Chief (Army Officer) says, [...] 'but come slowly, slowly'," said Sucker.

That's what he reported to them. Then across and opposite us on the other side of the pace called Blue Clay Point horses were seen to be going, and many people too. There were more than twenty. They could be seen going up there over the crest of the hill. People watched and wondered if they had just decided to go back home. But they moved on over the hill and then turned and started coming in this direction along its base. Over here on this side the soldiers were all prepared and were inside the trading post. The entrance way was large, and on both sides of it soldiers were stationed. Over there on this side the people were impatient to shoot. They were really stroking their weapons. They were rubbing their guns, it is said. They were really foolhardy – at least that's what the spectators were saying.

The white man called The Bat used to say that he was on the soldier's side "I too had my gun ready like this," he used to say.

People would laugh at him when he told about this. He was a trader.

"If they appear over the hill – if they're serious in their threat – if they come close, I'll go out there in the open to meet them," said the War Chief (Officer). "If they are serious about it, and if one of them aims at me with one of those guns you see them holding up out there, all of you fire a volley at him," said the officer. That was the plan on the inside.

Then they appeared, coming over the hilltop. They were coming toward us. At this point Sucker rode back and forth telling them to take it easy. That was the one called Sucker. Later, when his voice gave out, he merely gestured about. We were standing by the trading post. There were many of us. We were standing close to a recess in the wall of the building where we could run for protection. When they had drawn near, [...] [he] brought out a chair, [(the one called) The Old Interpreter]. He put it down beside the building, and then went back inside. We were all looking over toward where the horses were approaching. They were holding many guns up, and they were also holding arrows. There were none without weapons. There were many coming, and they were spread out quite wide.

Then the white man came out. It was the War Chief. He was from Fort Wingate and was dressed in a black coat. He took it off and draped it over the chair that had been placed there. Then he unbuttoned his cuffs. He rolled up his sleeves like a person who is going to start washing himself. When he came out he came with his arms up and his hands behind his head. Then Chee Dodge came back out. [While the people were only looking over there], The Old Interpreter came back out. "He says to come closer," said Chee to the horsemen. They drew closer. "Come closer," he again said. So the horsemen drew closer "Now that's close enough, he says to you, my friends. That's enough, Black Horse. Lay your gun on the ground and go up to him, the officer says, said Chee, referring to Black Horse as some kind of relative like "older brother."

Several of them then got quickly down from their horses. They came up one after another. The officer still stood with his hands raised. Black Horse walked up and shook hands with him. I don't remember what he said at that time. It was Black Horse. What the officer said was interpreted. I still remember some of that. "He says to you, 'Fall right, that's fine'," said Chee to Black Horse, interpreting. "That's enough, enough", he said to him.

Then those who followed him came up one by one and shook hands with the officer. "It's enough", said Black Horse and the officer to each other, as they embraced and patted each other on the shoulder. That's all I remember. At that point peace was restored, I guess. Those who were behind Black Horse all shook hands with the officer. They did this after laying their weapons on the ground. They came up and did it empty-handed. That's how peace was restored. And there was the sound of people expressing their thankfulness.

"That's enough my boys. Now food will be passed out for you. You can go back home braced by a meal," they were told.

With Chee Dodge interpreting, that's how we heard it. So peace was then restored.

I didn't realize the seriousness of it at that time. At that time I was just a "young punk." that's probably the reason. I was just there with the crowd for fun. I had fun with it, just like at something that is carried on for fun.

B The trouble at Round Rock – Howard Gorman

B.1 Summary & Background

This version of The Trouble at Round Rock, told by Howard Gorman, provides a different perspective on the historical clash involving Black Horse. Gorman begins by recalling the cultural tradition of elders instructing youth and frames the story as both a historical account and a moral lesson. In this version, Gorman tells the story as reported by his grandfather (“Man Who Lassoed”), who calls Black Horse “Butcher Squeezed Together In the Middle”. Here, Black Horse is depicted as more boastful and antagonistic than in Left-Handed Mexican Clansman’s telling. Gorman’s grandfather confronts Black Horse directly and condemns his reckless actions and discouraging unnecessary conflict.

Unlike the earlier version, which portrays Black Horse’s actions in a more collaborative resistance against the Agent, Gorman’s account casts Black Horse as a figure of bravado who retreats when challenged. The narrative also shows how futile it is to cause disturbances, as other leaders are mentioned who gained nothing but hardship from similar conflicts. Through his grandfather’s words T’áá t’óó ’ák’ijí’ dahojool’chijí. Jó ’akon, doo nijichxq’ da she’awéé’ (“They merely brought hardship upon themselves. So, don’t sulk, my baby.”), Gorman conveys a moral message whereby restraint and peace should be favored over impulsive rebellion.

B.2 English translation

Long ago the old men used to tell about various things. They would tell the young men about different things by way of instruction. They would spend two or three days going about to different homes (telling stories). They would say, “This is the way we used to live, the way we used to go about, the way we used to gain our livelihood,” instructing the youths. And on the women’s side, they in turn talked to young ladies.

In this connection my grandmother would get me up very early in the morning to make a long run, telling me that I would that way become a strong, husky man.

Once when I was herding sheep I came back to the hogan to find my grandfather, one called Man Who Lassoed, sitting there. He used to spend most of his time in the area around Adobe Sticks Up. The old man called Man Who Lassoed was quite a character.

He was still there when I returned. So a sheep was immediately caught for him and butchered. Then the fattest ribs were put in the fire (to roast) for him. But for me – only the entrails were roasted for me. So I made a fuss about that and started to make trouble. “How come he gets the choice meat when he does none of the herding? I’m the one who should have the ribs to eat. He’s the one who ought to be eating the entrails,” I made a fuss saying.

Then I sulked around and didn’t eat at all. And after he had really eaten his fill he went off to one side and lay down on his back.

After sundown, when it became really dark, I went back inside to the place where I would sleep. But my grandmother got me back up.

“Sit here, my son. Your grandfather is going to tell us about something. Listen to him carefully,” she told me.

“Not too awfully long ago, over there at Red Rock, the Agent was thrown out. And a man by the name of Black Horse caused the trouble. This same man used to go by the name of Butcher Squeezed Together In the Middle,” said my grandfather as he began his story. He told it as though it were something that had just occurred. Here’s how this story went:

“I was resting in the shade at Lizard Spring when a horseman came up. He said, ‘Do you know what? Over there at Red Rock they’ve tossed out the Agent. The man called Black Horse, or Butcher Squeezed Together In the Middle, is causing the trouble. That’s what he announced to me,’ said my grandfather.

“My horse was grazing nearby, so I caught and saddled him. Then I put my double barreled gun into its saddle scabbard and strapped on my pistol. I also strapped on my small pistol. I also tied on the rear a package containing an ample supply of ammunition. Then I went down into the Flat Rock Valley.

“I met up with a number of husky men and asked them if any would like to go with me. I told them that a man known as Black Horse was causing trouble over there, but they all refused. I kept on going nevertheless. Suddenly I came upon a man of the Red Streak Into Water Clan called Little Policeman [from Chinle]. He was a strong, husky young fellow (he is now an old man),” said my grandfather.

“I hear that the man called Black Horse is causing trouble. Maybe you’d like to join up with me and go over there. I hear they’ve tossed out the Agent. It’s because I got word of it that I’m going’, I told him,” said my grandfather.

“Why not? Sure, I’ll join you. We’ll go,” he said as he strapped on his gun. Then we started out together.

“We went down into the Canyon De Chelly and came up out of there at a place called Sparse Group Of Pines Extends Up Out. From there we went to Lukachukai and up onto the mountain. Then we went onward to the rim of the mountain to where the trail descended into Cove. At that time it was only a horse trail, There, at that time, there was a fence of boughs with a pole gate through which passed a trail,” said grandfather.

“[He] dismounted to open the gate, [the one called Little Policeman]. There was danger lurking on every side. It was potentially a perilous area. Just as he got down from his horse and took hold of a pole to remove it, a cottontail jumped up right at his feet. Little Policeman was so taken back that he nearly fell over right there.

“We resumed our journey and came to a high point that overlooked the surrounding country, and out there in front of us there were people engaged in training maneuvers. They were Navajos. They would come dashing out lying close beside their horses in such a way that there appeared to be no riders. And their maneuvers took many other forms. On the high points they had lookouts stationed, but somehow we passed through without being sighted. that’s probably because they were on lookout. Somehow we crossed their lookout points without them seeing us,” [he said.]

“We went on until we came to Black Horse’s hogan. There was quite a gathering there. When we arrived we heard Black Horse talking inside a large hogan, telling how they would do and how they would win.

“Then he was informed of our coming. ‘Who the devil comes without saying a word? Tell them to come in,’ he said. So we went in.

“‘You who are called Black Horse – you who go by the name of Butcher Squeezed Together In The Middle – you think you’re famous, the way people tell about you. Come on and see if you can swallow me head first,’ I said to him,” said my grandfather [Man Who Lassoed].

“‘Oh, oh you’ve got me,’ said Black Horse.”

“And then all the people who were gathered there, and to whom he had been talking, roared out at him, saying, “We knew that’s what you would say. We knew it all the time. You went ahead, even though you’re a coward. When even a fellow Navajo spoke to you, you said, ‘You’ve got me!’”

“And then I really told Black Horse off, but good,” said my grandfather.

“This trouble that you’re making is uncalled for. Over toward Tuba City a fellow known as Pollen caused trouble and got nothing for it. Over by Aneth a man called He Who Has Supernatural Power caused trouble. And over toward Beautiful Mountain a man by the name of Bizhoshi made a commotion. None of them gained a thing. They merely brought hardship upon themselves. So don't sulk, my baby. It's uncalled for, and it is bad behavior. You will gain nothing by it," my grandfather said to me. He told me this story and gave me instructions on top of it. I now remember this well.

C The trouble at Round Rock – The Nephew of Former Big Man

C.1 Summary & Background

This version of The Trouble at Round Rock is narrated by the Nephew of Former Big Man as another indirect witness to the fight. This account centers the divisive opinions among the community regarding the conflict over schooling Navajo children. Unlike Left-Handed Mexican Clansman's version, which focuses on the assertive opposition led by Black Horse, this story highlights the other figures – such as Limper, Slow One, and Weela – who resisted the government orders, and spotlights Nephew of Former Big Man's sister as a peacemaker who helps restore calm when tensions nearly erupt into violence. The narrator takes however the side of the agencies, as he portrays the policeman Bead Clan Gambler as a hero who defended the agent from the mob by sheltering him in a storage room.

The Nephew of Former Big Man expresses pride for being acknowledged as an advocate for the schooling system and also regrets not having attended school. According to him, formal schooling as essential for a good future. Through his perspective, he encourages young people to appreciate the opportunities now available.

C.2 English translation

In the Fort Sumner Treaty we were told to place our children in school. So when we got back policemen were sent from Fort Defiance down toward Round Rock to carry out this provision. To get all of the children they went from hogan to hogan. The leader of one of the parties was a man named Charlie. Others in this party were one called Bobbed Hair, one by the name of Bead Clan Gambler, one called Slender Curly Hair another called Slender Silver Maker, and the one who was known as The Interpreter (Chee Dodge), as well as several others. After we volunteered some men, they would travel down there.

For a long time the men and womenfolk had held back their children. So on the dates set for bringing the children to Round Rock, very few were brought in.

When the children were taken there a man with the name of Black Horse said, “No,” and stood against the children being taken away to school. There was a man by the name of Limper, who may still be hunched with old age (still alive). There was one called Slow One, and there were Canyon De Chelly Man, Tall Bitter Water Clansman, Ugly Knife, Sucker, Weela, and Gray Haired Man. All of these said, “No,” and stood against the proposal. And then many young men joined with them. All of these men are now perhaps dead.

Here at this meeting to get children together for school the man known as Black Horse stubbornly balked on it. “What the devil, you can jerk our children away from us if you want to. If you want trouble over this matter go to it,” he shouted. Several others who were of like mind were behind him. In fact, they had probably conspired with him.

The one called Little Chief (Shipley) came also. He was the Agent. But when a hot argument got under way in the meeting, the Navajos threw the Agent out. Then things really happened. The man called Bead Clan Gambler got the Agent back from those who had laid hands on him. This Bead Clan Gambler was a husky man. As the mob made away with the Agent he dashed in among them and grabbed the Agent up under one arm (like a football). When the mobsters would have jumped him he straight-armed them and bowled them over backward, and running hard he beat them to a flour storage room. When he had gotten the Agent in there he piled things against the door from within, and the mob was frustrated. The Interpreter (Chee Dodge) also took refuge in the flour storage room. It was said that they stayed inside for several days without going outside. And while they were in there they dirtied the flour.

The news of this trouble spread all about, even up into the Monument Valley. “They’re not going to take our children away, that’s all there is to it.” People were ready to fight.

Some said that no soldiers had come to the scene of the trouble. Some said that bear hunters had been brought to the rescue, but the truth is that it wasn’t these. That was just a tale. Soldiers came from Fort Defiance. They were sent from there, and those who came moved up on top of Row of Willows (near Wheatfields). At that time there was a beautiful meadow there. There was not a single wash at that time. There they were encamped. When they moved again they went to the burned trading post at Black Rock Spring (near Tsailee). After camping there for two days they moved on. They moved down to Bue Clay Point (near Round Rock).

This was not the only time a school party went out. They went out many times. Summer and winter they would go about telling the people to place their children in school.

When the soldiers who were sent for arrived to fight, my older sister, who was the wife of Weela, acted as a peacemaker. Here she acted as a go-between to restore the peace. One man took credit for restoring peace. He was a man called White Man. I heard him saying that he was the one who restored the peace. [...] “You are a liar. You just made that story up. It was my sister who restored the peace. I know it. I am sure of it,” [I told him]. So that is how Black Horse made trouble by holding back the children.

Now school is a wonderful thing. They had no reason for keeping us out of school, I’m convinced of that. School is not a thing of no value. It is something to be longed for and sought after. Had I gone to school I wonder how I would be today. By school we mean an endless learning. It’s a means for accomplishment without end.

People who have children, and who put them in school, are right in so doing. I think they are indeed lucky children. I was one of those who spoke in favor of schools in days gone by. Not long ago a paper was brought up before us in a meeting. They said, “Here’s a list of the men who asked for education, and here’s one of the men. These men knew the advantages of schooling.” They said this, mentioning my part in it. When they mentioned me in this connection I almost wept. I was right when I took a stand. Had I gone to school I often wonder how good a leader I might have become.

Long ago our forbears went after one another with weapons over this question of schooling. On account of differences over education they threw out an Agent. It nearly brought tragedy. When people were about to come to blows my sister restored the peace. These things happened just about the time when my mind had become mature enough to reason and remember. So, I know whereof I speak. And to many things which occurred I was a witness, while in others I took an active part. So the people nearly came to blows over schools. But now education is, without doubt, the right thing. So go on children. Go to school. Study hard. In the future you will profit by it.

D The traditional Navajo country — No author specified

D.1 Summary & Background

Young & Morgan (1954) include a collection of “accounts given by old men to establish the area of the Navajo occupancy – the Navajo domain” under the title Traditional Navajo Country (p. 10). The first account in this collection, which is presented here, is told by a Navajo medicine man, who recounts a story passed down by his grandfather, known as Man With A Moustache. Importantly, the text is fragmentary: Young & Morgan (1954: 13–14) include an additional section in English that does not appear in the Navajo version. The narrative presented here includes only the translated portion of the original Navajo.

The narrative begins with the First People dwelling in the Underworld, where the mountains Sierra Blanca Peak (Sisnaajiní), Mount Taylor (Tsoodzil), San Francisco Peak (Dook’o’ooslííd) La Plata Mountain (Dibéntsaa), Huerfano (Dził Ná’oodilíi) and Gobernador Knob (Ch’ool’í’i) existed. Their story of emergence is marked by a disruption caused by Coyote, who captures the offspring of the Water Monster, instigating a series of events that force the people to seek escape as water rises in the Underworld. As they struggle, supernatural beings Sun and Moon aid them, and Locust eventually helps them find their way to the Earth’s surface through La Plata Mountain. In their emergence, they bring with them elements essential to their survival, including seeds, plants, and knowledge of the Sacred Mountains, which define their new homeland. As the People establish themselves in this new world, First Man and First Woman position the four Sacred Mountains (Sisnaajiní, Tsoodzil, Dook’o’ooslííd, Dibéntsaa) in the cardinal directions. The storyteller emphasizes that these Sacred Mountains represent the heart of the Navajo world as both physical boundaries and spiritual anchors.

D.2 English translation

I am a medicine man. I am going to tell the story I got long ago from a man called Man With A Moustache, who was my grandfather. It was twenty-seven years ago that he died of old age, at the age of a hundred and two years; I shall now begin to tell you his story, the one which he himself told to me. It is said that long ago in the Underworld, there existed the mountains known as Sierra Blanca Peak, Mount Taylor, San Francisco Peak, La Plata, Huerfano, and Gobernador Knob. And people were in existence living there. It was then that Coyote did something. Somewhere a river was flowing, it is said. The offspring of Grabs Things in Deep Water (a Water Monster) was floating about when Coyote approached it and tried to get it. He lassoed it with a sunbeam and pulled it ashore. For that reason, things began to go badly for The People. All the birds that fly flocked together for no apparent reason. Something black kept rising up and receding. Cold came from the south, the west, and the north, it is said. The People wondered what it was. They looked and found it to be water.

It was then that First Man and First Woman picked up Sierra Blanca Peak. They picked up Mount Taylor, San Francisco Peak, La Plata Mountain, Huerfano, and Gobernador Knob. They gathered up all the seeds of plants. In a certain place, there was a mountain, and all the creatures climbed to its summit. Then the mountain began to absorb the water and dissolve itself into mud with them on it. At this point, they became desperate and planted a tree to ascend by—a fir tree, they say—but it only grew to the present height of such trees. They were in desperation, and while they were in the treetop, two people (men) of some kind arrived there nearby. “Who can they be? Someone go and tell them what the situation is,” someone said. At that point, they were informed, and they came over. “Could it be that you might do something?” they were asked. “That’s the way to talk,” they said, and room was made for them. One of them started off to one side (out of sight). His companion was asked, “Who is that?” “He is my maternal uncle. He is the Sun,” he replied. He came back in as soon as he felt sure that they had named him. When that one came back in, the other one started away. Then this one was asked, “Who is that?” “He is the Moon. He is my maternal uncle,” he said. That is why The People do not speak each others’ names in each others’ presence. Here is where the precedent was established.

This is about the only way, he said, as he stuck his big reed flute into the ground. His companion had a pine tree flute. Before long, there appeared a white speck where the flute extended against the sky. Then they got into it, got into it, got into it – moved. The Turkey was last. His tail stuck into the foam, so the white tip is the foam, they say. The People climbed up to one of the sky ledges, and there all those who could dig tried in vain. “It’s next to impossible, my grandchildren. There are layers of rock,” said Gopher. (That is why he doesn’t dig straight down; instead, he merely digs a little way down in the top layer of soil and thereafter makes his hole horizontally.) Then the Locust went over, and he got through. He climbed up out on La Plata Mountain at the place called Where They Emerged. They found a lake of water standing there, it is said, impounded by Gray Mountain and Tobacco Mountain. There was a great expanse of water in the midst of which Locust appeared as a black speck. There was something called Those With a White Spot On The Nose (a monster). These could be seen floating leisurely in the four directions. They appeared as black marks. The one on the south was blue; the one on the west was yellow; the one on the north was white, and the one on the east was black. Each of them was holding up an obsidian knife, which was their weapon.

It was then the black thing from the east rushed at him. “Don’t Blink! Don’t Blink! Look out!” said the Wind to him, said the Child of the Wind to him, whispering into his ear. That was one of our Holy Ones who used to tell us things. At this point, the Monster made a pass at him with the weapon. Then the one from the south rushed at him and did the same. Then they initiated him from the four directions (as the Ye’ii initiate little children so the latter will not go blind). “There are many people from down below. We were living in plenty in the Underworld, but the water was rising on us, and that is why we came up,” it was said. “We are to live here,” The People say. It is thus that it has come about. “So all of this water should be allowed to flow away,” said the Locust. “No,” he was told. “No,” he said, it is said. “Then I also refuse (to go back down into the Underworld),” said Locust. This (dialogue) took place four times.

Then he (Locust) pulled out something fletched with tail feathers. There was a passage through his chest[. T]hrough which to pass these [(]feathered[)] objects. [(]He ran the two objects across his mouth[)] and then through the passage in his chest, sticking one in from one side and one in from the other and then crossing his arms to pull them out in opposite directions. “All right, let’s see if you can do what I did. If you can do what I did, then we will let the water stand,” said Locust. This is what happened. (He used to blink his eyes until the Wind told him not to do so, and that is why Locust does not blink even today.) Then the black things said, “No,” that they could not do what he had done. So it was that he won the water.

Mountain Sheep was notified, and with a sheep’s horn, he dug the way out for the water. He dug through Tobacco Mountain (Grand Canyon Mountain), and the instrument with which he dug still stands over there where the mountains run together. That’s the Sheep’s Horn, my grandfather said. It happened like this, it is told. Then Badger came and made the hole from the Underworld larger, and the people emerged through there. Badger really got himself covered with mud, and that is how his belly became black. But the water from the Underworld was still rising behind them, and presently from the hole, there stuck the horn of Grabs Things In Deep Water.

“What’s the matter? Why are we being treated in this way?” The People said. “While we were living down there in the Underworld, that one called Coyote really got into a lot of trouble and mischief. Could it be because he has the baby of Grabs Things In Deep Water?” they said. They searched him, and there it lay in his armpit. It fell out, and when this happened, they knew. They suggested throwing it back, but Coyote protested. “No. What will we have to live by? I did it so we would have this (as a god) to live by,” Coyote said. There, between the horns of Grabs Things In Deep Water, there was swirling black foam. A kind of Hard Goods called “perfect” was placed between the horns. In exchange for that, the lapping water receded, and some of the foam was gathered by The People.

“If this one is thrown back into the water, then what will we live by?” they said. Grabs Things In Deep Water, the one who had stuck his head up, went back down, and his baby came up above to become the thunder and lightning. That’s what we live with when it rains. It is thus, it is said. This earth was just a soft mass, it is said. The wind was notified, and for four days it blew. But the earth hardened and packed only slightly. Some foxtail grass was planted. Those of the squirrel family, such as the Fox Squirrel, brought the seeds of plants and nuts up from below as food. A tree was planted, and it held firm by the roots. First Man took the mountains he had picked up. A song was heard, and he put Sierra Blanca Peak in its proper location over in the east. “Let this mountain be placed far away; let it lie far away so our thoughts will be long,” he said.

He set Sierra Blanca Peak in its position, and it was of White Shell. Then Mount Taylor was set in its position, and it was of Turquoise. These two mountains were put in their positions, and both Haashch’éełti’i and Haashch’éoghaan (two supernatural beings or divinities) took their place in them. Then San Francisco Peak was set in position. It was placed in the west and was of Abalone. Haashch’éełti’i and Haashch’éoghaan took their places in it. La Plata Mountain was set up in the north. It was adorned with Jet, and Haashch’éełti’i and Haashch’éoghaan took their place in it. There it happened again, it is said. So, in the form of these Sacred Mountains, was our Mother made for us. Sierra Blanca Peak is our Mother. Among the white people, the missionaries speak like that.

This mountain, called Sierra Blanca Peak, is our missionary (i.e., our religion). In accord with it, we live. In the midst of these four Sacred Mountains that were placed, there we live. With that, we who are The People are the heart of the world. These Sacred Mountains that were placed for us are the boundaries of our domain. They are our boundaries. I am a medicine man, so I have some of the soil from these Sacred Mountains. These were established with White Shell, Sheep,

Domestic Animals, Maidens, and Youths. In accord with that do we live. Those of The People who possess livestock possess it by virtue of the power derived from the soil of the Sacred Mountains. And we who are medicine men – this is our way. We have the Mountain Prayers and the Mountain Songs. [Now it is like this.]

E The first mother-in-law – Tony Tsosie

E.1 Summary & Background

In The First Mother-in-law, Tony Tsosie narrates a tale set at Gobernador Knob, where First Man, First Woman, White Shell Woman, and Changing Woman were gathered. At dawn, First Man notices a small cloud hovering over the peak. Each morning, he observes the cloud descending until it obscures the mountain completely. After four days of this mysterious occurrence, First Woman urges him to investigate. When First Man arrives at Gobernador Knob, he hears a noise repeated four times, and finds a baby. Just then, Talking God appears from the east, and claims the child. First Man and Talking God debate who will raise the child until Talking God relents. First Man takes the child back to First Woman, and the baby matures quickly to a young woman and is able to perform errands within four days.

One day, while gathering wood, the young woman is held down by an unseen force. Turning around, she discovers it is the Sun, adorned with turquoise earrings, who instructs her to ask her parents to build a separate brush shelter. That night, she sleeps in the shelter and is visited by the Sun, who lies beside her under a robe. Sun tells the woman to show the robe to her parents for proof of his visitation.

The story provides several cultural elements, such as the centering of the number four in repeated acts. It also explains the origin for the mother-in-law tradition: Sons-in-law provide merely a gift to their mother-in-laws, but cannot see them, and as such, the mother-in-law is called “the one whom one does not see.”

E.2 English translation

There are stories which tell of the events which took place long ago on this earth of ours. They say that this story took place at Gobernador Knob.

Those called First Man and First Woman, and White Shell Woman and Changing Woman had come together and they were sitting. Just as dawn was breaking

First Man went outdoors to urinate; he glanced over at the peak of Gobernador Knob, and saw a little cloud hanging there, it is said. When he went back inside he said, “I wonder why it is that there is a little cloud hanging over there on the summit of Gobernador Knob?” he said, it is said. “Why, it’s true. I wonder why it is?” exclaimed First Woman while she ran outside too.

The sun set again. And then with the first streak of dawn it was that way again. When First Man got up he saw that it was that way again. But this time the cloud hung a little lower down on the peak. When he went back inside he again mentioned it. And the Woman again ran out. “It sure is. I wonder why it is?” she said again. And it was that way all day.

When dawn came First Man got up. He again looked at Gobernador Peak and the dark cloud was still farther down. Only the base of the mountain was visible. “What can it be over there at Gobernador Knob?” It is said that right now there is only a visible section underneath the dark clouds that are covering it,” he said. “Let me see,” again said the Woman. “It sure is,” she again said. And it was that way again all day.

And then at the first streak of dawn he got up and again looked at Gobernador Knob. And he found that it had become invisible. This made the fourth time. This being the fourth time, First Woman said to him, “Go see what you can find out. Investigate it. Why does it do that?” she said to him.

So he set out for there. When he arrived there he found that visibility was poor. One could not see even along the edge of it. He went some distance, and then decided to turn back. Just as he turned to start back he heard something. But he looked around without seeing anything. He started off again, but again there was a noise. And it happened that way four times. He stopped in his tracks and a corn fly chirped. Then he went back to where the noise came from, and found a baby lying there, it is said. And at that moment he heard Talking God speak over toward the east. “Woo, woo,” he said. After he had spoken four times he appeared right there. “I’ve come for this baby,” said Talking God. “I also came for her,” First Man told him. For a long time they argued about this matter. “I will surely grow by means of it. It will be like this in the future,” they said to each other. “I will raise her with the pollen from the plants and with beautiful flowers,” said Talking God. “So will I. I have everything with which to raise her. I will raise her with the pollen from plants, and with berries,” said First Man. They argued that way for a long time, and finally the one called Talking God stepped aside. And then he went back into the dawn, it is said.

Then First Man picked up the baby and started toward First Woman with it. With care the baby grew up quickly. Before the fourth day following that on which she was picked up, she could be sent on errands. She could bring fire wood on her back. On the fourth day she again went after wood and Sun came down upon her. On the fourth day she again went after wood and Sun came down upon her. She was trying to get up with the load of wood on her back, but something was holding it down. Something kept holding it down and she could not lift it up. After the fourth try she said, “What is holding my wood down?” As she said this she turned her head around and there was Sun covered with (turquoise) earrings. So she knew that it must have been Sun who was holding down her wood. “Your father and mother know the purpose of my actions. Tell them to build a brush shelter a little way from the hogan,” Sun said as he went back.

So she picked up the firewood, and when she got back home she told her mother and father. So the brush shelter was made for her. She sat down alone there to spend the night. There was nothing whatsoever inside the shelter. There was not even bedding there. When she became sleepy she just lay down on the ground. She slept for quite a while. At midnight she found that someone was lying beside her. It was the same one who had come to her when she had gone for wood. Right there they slept together. They spent the night beneath a robe.

“Your mother and father will not believe, perhaps. So, give them this robe as proof (so that they believe). The custom of building a separate home in connection with those who marry will go on into the future. It will be the custom,” said Sun as he went back up. That is the story they tell about the origin of the name “the one whom one does not see” (mother-in-law). (Because Sun did not look up on the girl’s mother, but merely sent a gift. The groom still gives the mother-in-law a gift at marriage, but doesn’t look at her.)

F A childhood tale — John C. Claw

F.1 Summary & Background

This narrative by John C. Claw recounts several childhood experiences. The first narrative recounts the experience of herding sheep with his cousin on Lukachukai Mountain. Claw describes how his cousin taught him the taboo about avoiding the word “bear” to prevent encounters, though Claw mischievously disregarded this advice, leading to a startling bear encounter that they both narrowly escaped. The narrator also tells how in the valley, they entertained themselves by riding rams and teasing a billy goat, who once chased them all the way home. Claw also recalls a community-wide rumor of a catastrophic flood that prompted people to flee to higher ground, though his family remained skeptical. Finally, he describes a close encounter with coyotes, where his loyal dog Gogo protected him from attack. Reflecting on these adventures, he emphasizes the value of family teachings and the need for Navajo children to learn traditional knowledge from their elders.

F.2 English translation

I have a little story to tell – a childhood story and one which I tell to the children. When I was little, perhaps eight years old, I used to herd sheep up on top of Lukachukai Mountain with a cousin. My cousin was just a little bit older than I was – he was perhaps nine years old at that time. That was about how big we were when we herded sheep by ourselves.

At that time up there on the mountain there were those that live in mountains, bears as they are called. But one does not mention their name “bear”. People who live over there toward the mountains never say “bear”. [...] ¹ Only my cousin had a smattering of such information, and he used to teach me what he knew. “There are certain things here in the mountains. There is something called ‘bear,’ but one never refers to it by that name. People do not say ‘bear’, so never say that word.” He would say as he taught me. He was older than I was so he had learned some things. “Bear is called by other names,” he would say, instructing me. “In the summertime it is called ‘bushy-tail.’” Then in the morning when we would take out the sheep, he would again remind me of this lesson.

We would take the sheep out, and we would herd them in a real wilderness area. These areas were dense with pine, spruce, aspen and oak. Water flowed out from the canyons, and little lakes lay in the flats beyond. It was very beautiful up there on the mountain at that time. We had a large herd of sheep. When they spread out into the brush we would just let them go and follow them. My cousin would tell me to go a certain direction, and we would then separate. When the sheep would be on the side of the mountain, I’d skirt them from above. And when I would go up there, I’d remember what he had told me about not mentioning the word ‘bear’. I used to go around wondering why under the sun a person should not say the word ‘bear’, so one day I decided to have some fun with my cousin by running down toward him as he walked along below me. So I dashed toward him. “Here comes a bear, cousin. Look out, look out! A bear! A bear!” I said, as I went zooming by him. After I had passed beyond him I turned around and came back to him.

I came back to where he was, and he was certainly angry. “What do you mean by dashing around and saying that? Don’t you remember that I told you that you are not say that under any circumstance? There could be some of them right here nearby. Don’t you remember? That’s why I told you that. I told you that they have a different name,” he said as he scolded me.

Then we started to follow the sheep again. We trailed them for quite a while when suddenly, from within a nearby oak clump, there came the sound of dogs barking loudly. What is it that the dogs can be heard barking at? I wondered what the dogs were barking at so I ran over there. My cousin followed me. I got over to where the dog was barking, and there I saw a bear standing. I stopped right there and looked at him. He was really angry. He stood growling. He was picking up things that were scattered on the ground about him, such as sticks and stones, and threw them at the dogs. He used sticks to strike among them. The dogs ran around him barking fiercely. I got that glimpse of him and then I dashed away. My cousin too lost no time in running away. I stopped at a place far removed from the scene. It was only after I stopped that my cousin caught up with me. Then we started off again, and went over to where the sheep were walking in order to get in ahead of them and cut them off. We headed them off toward the flat. We herded them back down to the open country. We stayed down there and herded the sheep until noon. That is how I saw my first bear. I saw another one on the following day, but at a distance, and walking on the mountainside. It turns out that must be a bear.

In the fall of that same year we moved from the mountain back down into the valley to herd down there. We had the rams in the herd, and they used to really fight with one another. When the rams would attack and butt each other we would each get astride a ram and then urge them to attack. We would sit on them, and when their heads came crashing together we would really die laughing. Some times we would fall off, and we would really laugh then too. That is how we used to have fun with the rams. Sometimes the rams would get far apart and my cousin would step in between them and then jump aside as their heads came together. The sheep would be grazing nearby, and we would spend the whole day playing with the rams.

Once we had billy goats in the herd. That took place down on the plain too, not in the mountains. We had one billy goat in the herd that was just a little bit mean. If a person would bother him, like pinching him or walking behind him, he would get mad. We always herded sheep with a burro, sitting one behind the other. But when one would be riding the burro the billy goat would merely look up if one teased him. He wouldn't do anything under these circumstances even if one got very close to him. But the minute you dismounted in front of him, he came for you. That is how we used to herd sheep when this dangerous billy goat was present.

One time we got to wondering what he might do to us. He was grazing at a distance, and we went up to him on the burro. When we got there I dismounted right in front of him. I went up behind him, and he wheeled around to face me. Then he started trotting toward me, so I ran over behind the burro. Then my cousin, with whom I was herding sheep, jumped off the burro too. He approached the goat that was chasing me and it ran toward him. The goat went for him, but just before it could hit him he jumped outside and the goat went on past him. The goat went a little distance, turned around and came for us again. The faithful burro that we rode was now behind the billy goat. So we ran in the direction opposite the burro, and the goat trotted along behind us. He was driving us away from the burro. We kept right on running ahead of him, with him trotting along behind us. We were running in the direction of home, which lay about three miles away. We got to a little hill near home, on which there were some outcroppings of rock. There we crawled into a little niche in the rock. The goat came right up to the opening, as we lay there in the space beneath the rock. He took his spite out on the rock, butting it, and bit at our feet. He did every thing he could think of, in an effort to get us out, while we just lay there kicking at him. My cousin told me not to bother him, to just keep quiet and lie still, so we just lay still. The goat tired in his efforts to get us so he calmed down too, and just stood there watching us.

After a long time the goat went away. The sun had just gone down, and as soon as the goat went away we crawled back out of the hole. We could see him going along homeward. So we followed him back home. Fortunately all the sheep had returned, as well as the burro. We went about the task of milking goats for our supper. My cousin did the milking, while usually held the goat's head for him. That was my job. While we were doing our milking this old goat that had chased us all over the place got mad at us again. He suddenly came for us from a place close by. I saw him coming, but before I could turn he butted me in the hip and knocked me down. My legs went up in the air and one of my moccasins fell off and went flying. I leapt to my feet and started to run with only one moccasin on. My cousin nearly died laughing at what happened there.

When we were children we used to do all of these things. It would have been otherwise had our mothers been there to watch over us and tell us what we shouldn't do. We were just little boys alone, wandering around behind the sheep. We just did any mischievous thing we felt like doing. My mother and father lived far away on the farm.

These things that I have told are things that happened when I was six or seven years old. When I was perhaps eight years old the people in the whole area hoaxed one another. There was a tale that there was going to be a terrible flood in which the waters would carry everything before them, and a lot of the people believed it. So they moved up onto the mountain. From this day on it was about thirty-two years ago that it happened in the summer. It was said that the first word of this had come from up north. The rumor was carried everywhere. In one day it spread all over the country. "The flood is going to be terrible. The ocean is overflowing. It will lie over us. The waters will come rolling over us. Go up to those high hills! Act quickly! Get up on those high places, for this is the greatest amount of water that ever lopped. There's no way of stopping the rise of this flood water. Hurry! Take all the livestock you can", people said as this terrible story went around. I remember this event. We were living in the valley and I was still herding with my cousin when this story went around. At this time we were down at Many Farms with our sheep, and word was brought to my father and mother. They didn't believe it. "This cannot be true. They're just talking and pulling our leg. How can the ocean go uphill? I don't believe that," said my father when the word was brought to him.

But all of our neighbors and relatives believed it, so there was really some movement. They started moving. They begged each other to go, saying, "It's true.

It's true. What's going to hold back the water? If it covers us over we'll certainly all die," the people said as they hastily got ready to move.

Everybody was moving in a different direction. Some moved over against Lukachukai Mountain. And some moved over to Black Mountain. This moving lasted for about three days. But the story had not affected us. Both my father and my mother had refused to believe it. We just kept on herding the sheep. People said the water was coming. When my cousin and I laid down to sleep at night we would wonder what the night might hold. We lived in a tent, for we stayed where the sheep were. But morning came and nothing had happened. So we spent another day herding and there was no water in sight. There were merely some black clouds in the distance. Perhaps there was rain here and there. Water wasn't expected throughout the following day. But no water came. That's what happened once. The people were victims of a flood hoax and all moved away. The old folks know about this. Those who moved away know about it. Every once in a while they make fun of one another about it. It's just a funny story. When they moved over to the mountains they went in wagons. They took their wagons just as close to the mountains as they possibly could. They made their wagons fast to pine trees and then continued on up the mountainside carrying their belongings on their backs. They fastened them to oak trees. To keep the water from carrying off their wagons people loaded them with rocks. They did this, thinking that they would still have their wagons when the flood receded. This event affected a large area but now people merely tell of it as a funny story.

One time the elder brother of this cousin I've been telling about and I were herding sheep alone and he told me, "Cousin, I'm going to herd by myself today. You just stay here and keep an eye on the camp. You watch our things," he said. I said all right, so he set off with the sheep by himself. He made me stay at home to watch the place. My only companion was a dog, and we just stayed in a tent.

All of a sudden, about noon, some coyotes attacked me. At that time there was a great many coyotes. There were coyotes everywhere. From behind the tent a coyote sprang on me. The dog that I had there was a big white one with black ears. I was watching the place with a dog named Gogo when the coyote sprang on me from behind the tent. Just as he attacked me Gogo sprang to the rescue and drove him off me. I was frightened to death. I started running and the dog right after me. From the distance I kept my eye on our things. And then another coyote attacked me from another side. Just as this one jumped on me the dog came to my rescue, and drove that one off too. That is how the dog protected me. Now as I think about it, it is a good thing to have a dog. A dog can save one's life. I still remember my dog. I don't forget him, because he protected me. A dog will save a person when he is alone without protection. I found that out.

It was about a year after that a lot of people died. The white people say that it was in 1918. It was at that time that people died from an epidemic of influenza. In some places whole families died. In other places just a few survived. I had a hard time during that period. I used to have some brothers and sisters. There were nine of us. I was the ninth. Eight of us died. I just barely pulled through. I had a hard time during the flu epidemic. At that time there were no doctors nearby. Probably the only hospital then was the one at Fort Defiance, and possible the one at Ganado. Just very recently some hospitals were built, but we do not have enough of them. As a result, when people got sick they really suffered everywhere. Back then that was how I suffered among others. I have told the things that happened when I was a boy. I'm telling it to you children. Some of you children have mothers and fathers who are living. Some of your mothers are not living. But even so, don't forget your parents. I am saying so. Sometimes a child gets into mischief and doesn't mind his mother. Even so, he gets wiser and wiser. His mind grows and strengthens, and when he is told to do something he knows what to do. As time goes on, a child develops his thinking from his mother and father. That's the Navajo way. That's the way children grow up. His grandparents are like teachers to him. He asks them how The People used to live, and they tell him. It is akin to the textbooks of the white people. It is said that, in the past, the people really made it a point to teach one another. But today we are lax and do not teach our children much. Some of us neglect our children. We somewhat don't think for our children. It's well doable for us to teach our children those things. Even though your children are taught for you in school, we should not lose sight of our teaching. I am now telling these stories of mine to your children. Thes stories that you heard are those that I remember happening when I was a child. So then it's good that one recalls those stories, those things that happened. That's how you have memories. That's how you strengthen your mind.

G Our abuse – Dan Phillips

G.1 Summary & Background

Our Abuse by Dan Phillips recounts the oppression faced by the Navajo people under government-imposed livestock reduction policies, which devastated their way of life. Phillips begins by addressing all levels of leadership, from the U.S. President to local officers, pleading for acknowledgment of the Navajo's suffering under policies that stripped them of livestock – their primary food source. Families, especially women and children, were forced to watch their goats, essential for milk and meat, taken away, leading to hunger, illness, and even death. Resistance to the policies was met with threats of jail, like in totalitarian regimes.

Phillips narrates his and others' journey to Washington, D.C., to seek justice, only to face rumors and arrests upon return, as police targeted dissenters, causing further trauma and loss. He contrasts their own poverty with the government's financial aid to the former enemy nations Germany and Japan, showing the irony that Native Americans, indigenous to the land, remain overlooked. Phillips urges national leaders to listen and restore the resources necessary for Navajo communities to survive who suffered under these unjust policies.

G.2 English translation

Back in the beginning we lived without knowledge of our leaders (i.e. the Government, President, Commissioner, etc.) To the President in Washington and the officials under him, to the government officials all the way from Washington down to Window Rock, to the Tribal Council Officers and to the members of the Council, to the Chapter Officers, the womenfolk and the youths, to all those who know what trouble is, we are telling about problems and asking them to give these matters their consideration.

In the matter of what was done to livestock, they began these activities with the goats. The womenfolk and children wept for their goats. The bleating of the milk goats that fed the children faded away into the distance, and the wails of the children arose in their stead – the wails of the children and the womenfolk.

They did not weep without reason, for the food of the people had been taken from them. It happened thus. Thereupon the police became active, and chaos reigned. Our leaders, and those of us who failed to comply with orders to reduce our livestock, or who did not want the Special Grazing Regulations, were told that we would be put in jail. We were told that any of us who spoke against the program would go to jail.

I still carry these thoughts in my mind. It is something akin to the dictatorial systems of government across the sea. We hear stories to the effect that, in those areas, anyone who speaks unfavorably about the Government is killed. That's where we're headed. Why should anyone be manhandled just because of his food and the things he lives from? There is one flag that flies over these 48 States, and there is no law whereby any group of people can be mistreated because of their way of living. There is no law to provide for the imprisonment of people just because they make their own living independently. So how does it happen that we were told these things? Where did this procedure come from?

Back at the time when we had 6 agencies things went well. There was a superintendent at Shiprock, one at Crownpoint, one at Fort Defiance, one at Keams Canyon, one at Leupp and one at Tuba City. These superintendents would meet together and discuss methods whereby our living could be improved, and whereby we could increase. They considered the improvement of our sheep and cattle.

Then a man by the name of John Collier turned up. At first he spoke as a champion of the Navajos. We thought, "Boy oh boy, that's wonderful! He's just the man we're looking for. He's the leader for us!"

That was our great mistake. He took office in Washington, and it wasn't long thereafter that he turned against us. He changed his policy and put a new one in its stead. "What the devil! There must be something we can do," the people said. "If it goes on like this, one of these policemen is going to get killed. They'll kill the superintendent. That's where this business is heading." Consequently, we held a meeting at Oljato, where the men discussed the problem.

There was a war dance going on over near Shonto, so we held another meeting there. Again the sheep question was discussed. We were being told to get rid of the sheep, and a number of hot arguments resulted. We returned home, and a short time later we heard that there would be a war dance near Kayenta. We planned to hold another meeting there to discuss ways of attacking this problem that confronted us. About this time a truck ran over me just a little way above Oljato.

The trader then took me down to a doctor at Kayenta, for at that time there was a hospital there. The doctor, however, told me that he was not there for cases of that type – for accident cases. A white man known as Doesn't Give A Hang About Anything, or as Shine Smith, as well as several traders, were witnesses to that. Then they packed me off to Tuba City where I recovered. There was a good, kind doctor there at Tuba City. He told me not to ride horseback or go on any trips for two years. My accident occurred in the fall. Then in May some people came to me with the proposition that I should make a trip back east. I said I would do so, because I felt that I was living on borrowed time anyway, and it would be worthwhile no matter what happened to me on this trip. I felt that I wouldn't regret it even if it cost me my life. So from Oljato I came down to Kayenta.

The purpose of our trip was already widely known. Word had been brought in about it, and a policeman was sent over. [Many policemen were sent over]. The date of our departure was known. We were warned that police were blocking the road over which we planned to go. It was said that police were waylaying us. People said, "Well, just let them sit there!" So we left them sitting there and took another route. We set off in the direction of Monticello, and thence to Cortez and Durango.

Over at Cortez we chanced to meet with a certain man. We told him that we were on our way to the east, that things had come to a terrible pass for our people, and we were hard hit. We told him that we wanted to find out what we could. [It thus happened.] At the time we ran across him, he was there in connection with the stock reduction program. He was officially connected with that program; he was one of the livestock-haters. Today we still hear of him and he was one of the men who joined forces with the government. There were several other Navajos who did likewise. Perhaps they did so because they acted blindly in the matter. Perhaps they did so because they actually couldn't stand livestock. The white people, and even some of our own people, often mislead us telling us that such and such is the best road to follow. Perhaps these men were misled in that way.

Now, on account of what they did, we have fallen into poverty.

Well, anyway, we went to Washington. The same offices that are there today were there then, and we went in to present the same pleas that we are presenting today. We went to the various offices and Bureaus. Thus it happened, and then we came back.

There were many rumors concerning us. Some said that the men who went to Washington had been jailed, and were in prison. It was said that they would never return. When we got back we found that those were the rumors that were making the rounds with regard to us. But we didn't even see a jail. We didn't even enter the dooryard of a jail.

We returned from there, and they (the police) began hauling away more womenfolk and young men (to jail). Some of these were injured by the cars. Some became sick from these injuries and died. In one case they were taking a woman to jail and she fell unconscious. This is a woman that we call Yellow Hair, and who comes from White Rock Mesa. In view of the fact that she became unconscious they merely hauled her back home and left her, instead of taking her on as they should have. Why should she be taken home after she fainted? There were several cases of this kind. That is how we were abused. All in all it was a sad story indeed. Many of our womenfolk died. Many of our men died. Children died for lack of meat. When they were taken to the hospital they were immediately given soup and milk. These were the only foods on which they could get well there. At the time when we could provide our own soup and milk the children were well.

Some of the men with whom I made the trip to Washington were put in jail on that account. Every day I figured that they would come for me, but they didn't put me in jail. There was a man sitting here a while ago that I don't believe was taken to jail either. That is the way we were treated. A great number of the people's livestock was taken away. Although we were told that it was to restore the land, the fact remains that hunger stood with [its] mouth open to devour us, [as well as poverty]. Before the stock that remained could reproduce, people slit the animals' throats to satisfy their starving children. Before the sheep could bear young the children's shoes would wear out. People would say, "Where can a sheep be sold?" When they heard of a place they would drive a couple of animals there. So instead of the stock increasing, it became less and less. And today one hears of many people who have come to possess stock permits for no reason at all (i.e. the permits are not filled or they have no more stock). There is no stock with which to replace what is gone. It has come to the pass that there is not a place from which they can get a single sheep.

Now there has come a lending program. It has as its purposes the restoration of the sheep, the goats, the cattle and the horses. But now I hear that only the people who have sheep, cattle and other things, or who are getting along well economically, will be given loans. A person who has no sheep is refused a loan. He is told that he has nothing with which to repay it. So that is a new source of trouble for us. It seems as though they tell them, "Go starve to death, you people who have nothing! You are taking up needed space." There are no permits for the new generation of young men and women. It would seem that they are merely headed for starvation.

When we went to the east we asked for schools and hospitals, but alas the school that we did have (here at Kayenta) was closed. The hospital was closed. The latter has not been restored to the present day. There is still no hospital. At present they come over to give us some encouragement, but that is all. It must be an awfully long distance to Washington. First they have to send money across the sea to Europe to take care of things there. On the other hand, we're right here before their eyes, but some of you who are our national leaders must first appropriate money for the Germans and the Japanese because those people are said to be starving. Those people made war upon you and wanted to kill you, but you say that they must come first; that they must eat first. In the east they are saying that they are becoming aware, that's why it is like that. We were here on our own land a long time before you white people came, increasing rapidly, but you came and reduced us to poverty. You have reduced us to poverty, but you pass us over, saying that the Germans must eat. So, my leaders who live in Washington, give us back something that is worthwhile. I do not speak thus to be critical of you. I do not speak thus out of hate for you. It is my plea. I say it because all of my neighbors feel likewise. All of my neighbors say so.

H The special grazing regulation — The Blind Man's Daughter

H.1 Summary & Background

The Special Grazing Regulations tells of The Blind Man's Daughter's hardship after grazing restrictions led to the loss of much of her flock, a blow that devastated her family's livelihood and health. Her husband, overcome by the injustice, fell ill and passed away in the spring. With five sons and seven daughters to support, she struggled to make ends meet on a small permit, a restrictive system like a relentless disease. The regulation, she explains, robbed her family of stability, forcing them into a life of hunger and constant hardship.

H.2 English translation

When I had a husband and a lot of sheep I was happy. Then when it came my sheeps' turn to be acted upon, they were all driven away from me. They were driven into a corral and I was told to select the ones that were the best. That hurt me and I just bowed my head. I just sent my children over and they selected some.

We became despondent over it. My husband became sick from worry, and these officials went about in their cars even at night. Early in the morning one would be going about. They even interrupted our sleep. They did this on account of our sheep and our way of life. When we drove our sheep to the dipping vat some more were taken away. It was there that my husband said, "You people are indeed heartless. You have now killed me. You have cut off my arms. You have cut off my legs. You have taken my head off. There is nothing left for me. This is the end of the trail," he said. This happened, and it wasn't long before my husband fell ill. It was no doubt the worry that sickened him. He was sick all winter, and at the beginning of spring he died.

These two events, the loss of my sheep and the loss of my husband, made me feel terribly unhappy. I was despondent, and I am still so today. I had five sons then, and seven daughters. We were all dependent on the small amount of stock granted to us on the permit (lit. we all climbed onto this tiny permit.) We could not always make ends meet (lit. some of us would fall off it and would grab about for something to reestablish our balance and get us back onto it.) In the course of getting one back onto it, another would fall off, so we really had to work closely together in order to stay on this permit. We suffered from everything, from hunger, from lack of meat and from despondency. The Special Grazing Regulation is like a killing disease from which one cannot sleep. We cannot live because of it. One will not walk pleasantly.

I I flew over Navajo land — Tim Yazzie

I.1 Summary & Background

In I Flew Over Navajo Land, Tim Yazzie recounts his experience as part of a selected group tasked with delivering aid by plane to Navajo communities affected by severe winter weather. The journey began on February 2 in 1949, as Yazzie and three other men set out from Tuba City, eventually boarding separate planes in Phoenix to survey and supply Navajo communities. Yazzie describes the flight over significant villages and sites such as Shonto, Oraibi, and Mexican Hat, and his role as a guide familiar with the terrain. Throughout the flights, they dropped essential supplies—hay, food, and firewood—over villages, witnessing people hurriedly gathering the resources on the ground. Yazzie describes the harsh landscape from above, observing cattle and horses immobilized by crusted snow, suffering animals, and sheep corralled for survival.

In the days that followed, Yazzie and his group met with officials, including the Governor of Arizona and an army officer, to discuss the challenges faced by the Navajo people. On multiple flights, Yazzie's planes encountered intense fog, turbulent weather, and even a motor fire, depicting the physical dangers faced by those delivering aid. This narrative provides insight into both the logistical struggles of providing aid by air and the broader emotional toll on Navajo communities amid environmental adversities.

I.2 English translation

On February 2, four of us set out from Tuba City. We were a selected group. We went to Winslow. At dusk we took off in a plane. We landed in Phoenix. It took us 30 minutes to get there.

Then early on the following morning we were awakened, and taken off in a car. We went to the Navy Field. At six o'clock we were put aboard a plane. There were four planes. We each got aboard a different one. I was sent aboard the plane called "Tomahawk." It was a four-motored plane. Planes of this type can carry a huge load. I found a great pile of alfalfa aboard. These planes can even carry automobiles.

Then we took off for the Navajo country. We flew over Winslow. When we passed the reservation boundary they said to me, "From now on it's up to you. You know where the people live." Then we flew over the lower end of the black lava peaks, and over Oraibi. And then over the lower end of the mountains and over Cow Springs. And then on over Shonto and over the ridge. And then on down to Oljato. Then we flew over Mexican Hat. While we were flying through there, there were other planes flying alongside us. They remained at the same distance apart. We had earphones on, and talked to one another by radio. This way we discussed our position with one another. This is how we arrived. And then we flew up along the San Juan River. Before we got to Shiprock we turned to go alongside the mountain range, toward Lukachukai. We circled several times over Lukachukai, and then we went toward Chinle. And then over Ganado and Klagnetoh, to the railroad. Then we turned around and went back over Greasewood and Sunrise Springs. Then we followed the ridge up over Black Mountain. We continued to Kayenta where we turned around. And then we started back to Phoenix, where we arrived at noon. We ate and then flew right back over on the same route, and everything that had happened seemed like a dream. It was late in the afternoon when we got back to Phoenix. That's how we went about over our land dropping hay. In the late evening we all returned to Phoenix. Like this I went across our land unloading bales of hay. And they told us there'd be another flight on the next morning.

On the next day, February 4, we took off again. We were awakened from sleep at four o'clock, before dawn. However, we didn't take off until six o'clock. That day the fog was really thick. You can't tell where you are in that kind of weather. On that day I was up 18,000 feet in the sky – I don't know how far above the clouds. I kept asking how high we were. And the pilot would tell me we were 18,000 feet above the ground (i.e. above sea level). I was just a little bit scared. The plane would repeatedly drop (in an air pocket). It would suddenly drop as much as 500 feet. The pilot told me he didn't blame me for being scared. It's a life or death matter when you ride a plane. Nevertheless, we hauled two loads that day. Nonetheless we hauled two loads again by the time the sun went down.

On the next day, which was February 5, we met with the Governor of Arizona. We also met with an army officer from California. These two men got aboard and we took off again. They radioed ahead that these men were aboard such and such a plane. We were loaded with hay, food and firewood. We dumped these on the Hopis. We dropped them on Walpi, Shipaulovi, Shimopovi, Oraibi, Hotevilla, and Ndadziizdeli. We made about two runs over these villages. As we flew over them we watched and saw people swarming about. We said they must be fighting over the firewood.

These men with whom we flew asked me many questions. "To what extent are the people suffering," they asked me. I pointed out to them the various things the people were suffering from. After we had inspected the reservation we flew back, but to Tucson. There the two men got off. As for us, we flew back and got off at Phoenix.

On the next day, which was the sixth, I didn't go out, because the plane had made me somewhat deaf. That happened to two of us.

On Monday the seventh I went again. We went out according to our instructions. That day we made four flights, hauling only hay.

On the eighth we again went out. The main thing we hauled was hay. Like on that other occasion, there was again a lot of fog. It looked strange up above the clouds. In some places the clouds looked like mountain ranges; some looked like sand dunes, and some exactly like mesas. You couldn't see the earth below. Nevertheless, we carried four loads. In the evening, on our return trip, one of the motors caught fire. It happened between Flagstaff and Phoenix. "Look what happened?" "It's burning!" said the pilot. I looked and saw a fire sitting out alongside. There's nothing you can do when such things happen. It's a scary situation. You never can tell what will happen. Even if you jump out you'll lose your life. Travel by plane means that death is involved. It cannot be known. You just sit and hope for the best. I racked my brains trying to think how we were going to put out the fire. But there is a fire extinguisher right alongside these motors so when something like this happens the fire is easily put out.

When we got back we were told that we could have the next day off. This was welcome news. It was no fun! The pilots take turns. Some fly until noon, and some take the afternoon shift. If there are four flights there are four pilots (one taking each flight). And those who did the dropping also took turns. But we (guides) had to stay aboard all day long. That was how it was too with the other Navajos with whom I went to Phoenix.

Some more (Navajos) followed us. They had the same function as we did. They thought it would be easy I heard them saying that. After three days (of flying), a man from Kayenta said that he had been unable to spot his own hogan. He simply couldn't find it. He had been asking that hay be dropped at his own house for three days, but he couldn't find it himself. "Nope! The plane almost turned over with me (looking for it)," he said with concern. He told me about this. This man I'm talking about is one called Checked Shirt. When he said the plane nearly turned over with him it was because (this plane was flying low and to gain altitude) the plane had to fly at a steep climb – (it seemed that it would fall over backward). That's what the pilot (of this plane) told me.

The small planes – the two motored ones – loaded at Winslow and hauled from there. These big planes have four motors. They loaded and hauled from Phoenix. They did this because the Winslow Airport was too small for them.

In flight the crew would discuss position. They knew this by means of a map and flight time. They work on a basis of single minutes. They would say it's so far between certain points. And they went on the basis of how many minutes it would take. So this is my experience up above the land of my people. I looked the place over from there.

And it is true. In some places cattle and horses were just standing about, probably on account of the crusted snow. They would break through this crust, and just stand there. They wouldn't go on. Then they would starve or freeze to death right where they stood. In some places the sheep were kept in the corrals all day long. People would merely bring them branches. This is how my people suffered. This was my people's disaster. Many people lost stock. Maybe the range riders and district supervisors feel thankful for it because it reduced the stock.

This is how my people suffered. This is no small matter. God punished us. That's what I think. There is a passage where God says that the people will be punished, and that's what happened. It happened eighteen years ago too. We were punished at that time. We Navajos still haven't found out that God is punishing us. That's the way it is.

Explanations of Abbreviations

This chapter provides an index of morpheme glosses and their respective morpheme category as categorized for the Navajo Corpus of Historical Narratives. The glosses include abbreviated and non-abbreviated morphemes that are not part of the root. In addition, the different allomorphs found in the corpus are listed to facilitate the identification in the texts.

Features

This section explains the abbreviated morphological glosses for morphs in the morphological categories. Only general features have been abbreviated. Therefore, if a morph’s semantics was too specific it has been written out explicitly, like j- ‘into_distance’. In other cases, if the semantics were too dependent on the meaning of the root or not identifiable, it has been decided to use the gloss TH for “thematic”. The entry indicates the meaning of the gloss, together with the category of the word root that they belong to (“v” if verbal, “pro” if pronominal, “n” if nominal, and “post” if postpositional) and, additionally for verbs, their morphological position (v:PRVB ‘preverb’; v:ITER ‘iterative’; v:DISTR ‘distributive’; v:OBJ ‘object’; v:AR ‘areal’; v:OSBJ ‘outer subject’; v:QUAL ‘qualifier’; v:AMS ‘aspect, mood, and subject’; v:VAL ‘valence’, v ‘verbal root’, see the entire template in Figure 1.8. It should be noted that some morphs express several of these features simultaneously, such as 1.SG.SI.PERF.

Verbal glosses, their categories and morphs

The following table provides a detailed list of the different verbal prefixes in the narratives, with reference to their categories and list of morphs. Given the high amount of homonymy, allomorphy and syncretism across morphemes, the reader might find this table helpful in identifying the glosses, especially for the ones labeled as TH (thematic). These include also non-abbreviated verbal glosses in affixes, but excludes glosses for root morphemes.

Nine Navajo narratives

Éí bik'ehgo kééhwiit'í. 'In accord with that, we live.' So speaks a medicine man after recounting how the four sacred mountains were set in place to anchor the world of the Diné. To live in accord with something is to know where you stand, even when the ground shifts. And the ground shifted constantly across the late 19th and early 20th centuries: at Round Rock where armed men faced down U.S. cavalry; in the canyons where boys fled from bears; in the corrals from which sheep were driven away by government agents; in the frozen winter when pilots dropped hay through fog to save starving communities. Nine Navajo Narratives captures these moments through nine annotated texts: three firsthand accounts of the 1892 "Trouble at Round Rock" over forced boarding schools; a sacred creation story; a traditional tale explaining a mother-in-law custom; a testimony of relief flights during the blizzard of 1949; a vivid childhood narrative of adventure and taboo; and two fierce political critiques of the devastating livestock reduction policies of the 1930s.

Drawn from the foundational collections of Young and Morgan, all texts are presented in parallel translation with full interlinear glossing and an introductory grammar sketch—an essential resource for understanding Navajo history, language, and survival.
